The War Question Not Settled.

Correspondence of the Daily News.

I am enabled to state with confidence that most extraordinary efforts have been made at the Tuileries, both yesterday and to-day, to turn the Emperor from his purpose, and to induce him to take advantage of Austria having yielded on the theoretical question of sending troops to Belgrade to announce to the world, in a manner not to be misunderstood, that a casus belli is no longer upon the cards. All the indications of the day (the article in the Constitutionnel and the rise at the Bourse only excepted) tend to show that the efforts of the peace party in the Cabinet have not been successful. On the contrary, the care and haste with which the public is informed through various indirect channels that the question now settled with Austria leaves others of more importance still unsolved, is a very remarkable system of a determination to keep a sore open. The true question to every reflecting mind is not whether Austria may avoid with more or less adroitness, affording any pretext for the commencement of hostilities, but whether the French Emperor will ultimately judge it for his own interest to give employment to his vast army on the plains of Lombardy. The Debats remarks sagaciously, and with as much point as is prudent, that the settlement of the Servian question leaves to the French journals which openly advocate war "the task of finding some other diplomatic difference sufficiently serious and sufficiently ripe to lead to the hope of a speedy rupture." There is every likelihood that the ingenuity of the journals in question will be equal to the occasion. The Siecle this morning tells the Pays roundly that it will "find out more every day;" that it the Pays, has not the voice of the Siecle—meaning the call for war. The Patrie, which till lately has taken rank as a peace journal, is this evening singularly careful to show that the latest news from Vienna leaves a variety of other difficulties open. It says openly that the serious difficulties relate to Italy, which be it remembered, we told semi-officially some days ago was not in the Emperor's mind when he spoke to M. Hubner on New Year's Day. The Patrie now says that there is no wisdom in denying the existence of complications which exist: "on the contrary, let us accustom ourselves to look them in the face so as to appreciate them calmly and dominate them authoritively. In a word, let us be

The Presse, which, long before the public had taken alarm, knew, by secret information, of the storm which was brewing, and wrote war articles which passed almost unperceived—the Presse, which is supposed to represent the ideas of those unofficial councillors who, in all probability, know more of what is passing in the Emperor's mind than his recognized ministers says, in an article headed "Politics and the Bourse":

We seek in vain the meaning of these violent alternations of fear and hope which agitate the Bourse. Yesterday everything appeared lost; to-day all is saved. Where, we may well ask, are the forewarning signs of the tempest, and where are the indications of the return of fine weather which have alternately disturbed the impressionable imagination of of the financial world? What new light has burst upon the situation? Will the Austrian incident be disentangled without a rupture by the supple hand of diplomacy or must the Gordian knot be cut by the sword? The whole question remains in just as much uncertainty as ever, and no one is in a position to affirm that the solution has advanced a single step either in one direction or another. What then is the meaning of all these heedless impulses which rush from the extremes of unjustifiable panic to unreflecting confidence? Let us beware lest behind these great movements of rise and fall there should be some of those artful manœuvres which take advantage of, if they do not invent the thou-and contradictory rumors, the origin of which is always unknown to the rerecity of which it is impossible to ascertain. Articles published in journals which pass rightly or wrongly as organs which receive semi-official communications are no sufficient guaranty for sensible men to believe that all difficulties are suddenly at an end. As to ourselves, we are not in the secret of the gods, we shall not cease to recommend to the interests to which we are now addressing ourselves the utmost prudence, and moreover that salutary distrust which avoids the snares set for the credulous and unwary on the perfidious territory of the Bourse. we repeat, that there is no change whatever in the situation,—there is another Constitutional article, and that is all. A celebrated orator once said in the tribune, 'Everything is possible in these days, the most unexpected things happen.' The events which the present generation have witnessed prove this not to be a great truth. Let us therefor be prepared for every contingency; let us hope for peace, for immense interests are involved in it; but let us await war itself with firmness, if war is to ensue from the present complications. Let us look war in the face without desiring it, but without fearing it; and let us never forget that if war entails ever regrettable calamities, war has sometimes served, and may again serve, the cause of justice, civilization, and liberty."

The article in the Constitutionnel, signed "A Renee," after announcing the recognition by the Porte of Prince Milosch, (an event already recorded in your columns) proceeds to state:—

"The Austrian Cabinet has decided on taking into account the observation submitted to it by all the Powers on the subject of the orders addressed to the Commander-in-Chief of the Austrian troops at Servia.—If we are well informed, it results from the explanations offered by the Vienna Cabinet that it fully acknowledges at the present day the importance and the bearing of Art. 29 of the treaty of Paris, and regards all idea of an intervention which should not have been previously concerted with the other Courts. Austria has, it is said, the intention, in offering eventual assistance to the Porte, to leave to the latter the task of coming to an understanding with the people

The Last British Outrage—the Right of Search again.

From the New York Times.

The "British outrage" on the Coast of Africa, which we reported in yesterday's Times, so far as the facts are known to us, is the natural and legitimate consequence of General Cass' admission, in the late discussion on the right to search, that a foreign cruiser boarding an American ship may be likened to a policeman making an arrest. The boarding, said a secretary, may take place whenever the cruiser has "reasonable grounds for suspecting that the vessel he is overhauling is sailing under false colors, but it takes place at his own risk. If it be found that he was mistaken, and that the vessel is a lawful vessel on a lawful errand, he is liable in damages for a wrongful act, just as the policeman is liable, in case he should arrest the wrong man, for false imprisonment." A policeman, acting in good faith, however, is never deterred by the legal consequences annexed to an error of this sort from verifying his suspicions. He knows perfectly well that in nine cases out of ten the victim will not seek any redress, and that, if he does seek it, no jury will award larger damages than are necessary to indicate that the officer had made a mistake. General Cass' parallel may, unfortunately for his own view of his position, be pursued to the close. The British cruiser, once recognized as a policeman, he becomes entitled to a policeman's immunities and indulgences from first to last. He may board and search in good faith. If the surmises on which his action is based are proved to be correct there is nothing more to be said—if incorrect, he acknowledges his error and offers to pay damages; but no government can exact exemplary dam-charge of a duty which they have since acknowledged to be legal. The actual damage done is all that can be fairly claimed and when this comes to be computed in money, in a mere case of boarding and detention, the sum is rarely large enough to inspire great caution.

The fact seems to be that General Cass, in the correspondence of last Summer, was bent rather on putting a stop to the British proceedings in the Gulf, than on settling the Right of Search question in a satisfactory manner. The "outrages" of which we were then complaining, were a general onslaught on American commerce in those seas. Most of the boardings were made apparently without any discrimination whatever. To insist, therefore, that no vessel should be boarded unless there existed reasonable grounds for suspecting her of being engaged in the Slave-trade, was to put a stop to the practices of which we complained, at once; for with regard to nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand with which the British cruisers fell in the Gulf of Mexico, there was not the shadow of a pretence for such a suspicion. But the establishment of this rule unfortunately does not seem to have settled the question, in the minds of the British at least. In certain localities, as for instance on the coast of Africa, the weight of presumption is not in favor of, but against vessels carrying the American flag. After what has occurred in the case of the Wanderer, it is hard to say where suspicions of British officers cruising in those seas cease to be "reasonable." If three or four months ago, we were asked to select a case to illustrate the extreme of unreasonable suspicion, we should certainly have selected that of a private yacht, owned and commanded by a Southern gentleman, and ostensibly sailing on a pleasure trip; and yet even in this case, suspicion has been proved to be capable of justification. Such a vessel, belonging to the Yacht Squadron of this City, and sailing under its colors, and owned by one of "the Chivalry," has actually been engaged in kidnapping on the Gold Coast. We know that there are large rumors of American vessels constantly engaged in the same quarter in "the odious traffic," that they carry our flag, and that they are not distinguishable by any peculiarity or rig or build, or pretension. Under General Cass' illustration, it would be difficult to select many vessels in the course of a year which a British officer may not board and search—not always lawfully, because he cannot always find damnatory proof, but always with excuses which he may fairly and successfully urge in mitigation of damages.

It would be hard to imagine a more unsatisfactory state of things, or one better calculated to ensure collisions, and brood ill-feeling and animosity between the two countries. It does not help to suppress the Slave-trade, and it gives our own officers on the Coast of Africa the air of cruising not for the prevention of the, traffic but the protection of the slavers against British cruisers. As long as our rights are left doubtful, or, in short, as long as any discretion with regard to our vessels is left in the hands of men over whom we have no control, or as long as we are jealous with regard to the exercise of that discretion, the main attention of our African Squadron must, of necessity, be not to the slavers, but to the pursuers. The question ought to be settled in some way. The policy to which Governments are so much addicted, and Mr. Buchanan's more than any, of providing for to-day and letting to-morrow take care of itself, when applied to the international relations, both friends and pretensions dissentions. There is but one way of settling the matter satisfactorily, and that is to prohibit the boarding of vessels carrying the American flag by foreign cruisers, suspicion or no suspicion. There must be no loophole left, if we want to avoid quarrels or recrimination. General Cass must revise his correspondence on the right of search, strike out the comparison of cruisers to persons personating policemen. In short, if we desire to place an absolute and definitive stopper on "the visit," we must lay down the law that foreign cruisers stand not in the position of real policemen erring in the performance of their duty, but of sham policemen committing a gross outrage. We must take the acts of which we complain out of the category of trespasses, for which the perpetrator is liable in a civil action for damages, and place them in that of a criminal offence, punishable by the criminal courts—or, in other words, by war. In the present position of this matter it forms a chronic—and because chronic, absurd—source of contentious and ill-feeling between two great nations. As the Cuban business does not seem to prosper, we recommend Mr. Buchanan to turn his attention to this little matter.

PARIS, Thursday, Jan 20, 1859.

The fashionable season was inaugurated last week by a grand reception and ball at the Tuileries. At this first ball, which usually fixes the fashions for the winter, it was remarked that the circumference of the ladies toilettes had not diminished; if there was any change since last winter it was on the side of augmentation. It was also remarked that there was a greater profusion of precious stones, especially of rubies, which seem to be coming into fashion again. We will soon arrive at that point where a woman will not be well dressed unless she carries a quarter of a million francs on her shoulders. Last winter it was a question whether the basket was to be continued or not—whether it should be augmented or diminished; were the robes to have points, were the corsages to be opened a cœur, or were the robes and the coiffures of the first Empire to be adopted?—This years robes, hoops, and corsages are smothered in the more important question of diamonds and rubies. The feminine world agree on this one point, however, that to reach the maximum of the comme il faut, to make their rivals die of jealousy as much money as possible must be put into precious stones and laces. The stones are glances of jealous eyes, the laces grate the more harshly on fretted nerves the longer they trail on the floor. In this duel of the diamonds it is the poor husband that gathers the lamb's share: he meekly accepts his part of the triumphs with the air of a man who wouldn't if he could help it.

The Emperor ingeniously lends his aid to this spoliation of the husbands of Paris, whether in the interests of the commercial classes, or in order to keep his companions poor and needy, or as an act of pure gallantry, I will not undertake to say; but not content with giving a large ball every fortnight, with an intermediary concert or theatrical representation, he is going to give two weekly receptions for the public functionaries and their families, who will be divided into two set and received on alternative nights. His latch-string will be literally always out. But then an invocation to the Palace is equivalent to an order, and must be obeyed; and as it is not etiquette for a lady to wear the same robe twice, nor the same head dress, not even the same setting of diamonds, you see where this excessive hospitality is going to lead to—just as if there were not already enough official brigands within the purlieus of the Tuileries without forcing new motives for illicit grabbings at the public crib.

The Destitution of the Wealthy.

"If tremblingly alive all o'er,
To smart and agonise at every pore,
Or quick effluvia darting through the brain,
Die of a rose in aromatic pain."—POPE.

(To the Editor of the London Weekly Times.)

SIR,—The great mirror of the age, a largely circulating newspaper, holds up to every scene its own presentment, and very various are they. Our most distinguished contemporary has lately applied its great photographing glass to two very different sets of objects—the Destitution of the Rich, and the destitution of the Poor. Berkeley-square and Cow Cross-street have been brought into juxtaposition, and we find that each has its miseries.

Berkeley-square so loudly bewails the want of a dinner as Cow Cross-street does the withdrawal of its Irish loaf, and the sympathies of the true philanthropist are appealed to because England labors under the odium of having but one sauce and a hundred religions. It is a difficult thing for the most enlightened of us working men to pass the lofty houses of the rich, to catch glimpses of mere entrance halls that look like saloons, to see through the perhaps yet unclosed shutters a superbly dressed party sitting round a table covered with silver and flowers, or glass and gold, with as many servants as guests, and a flood of light shedding itself on the richest furniture and rarest pictures, and not to imagine, that if there is joy to be found upon earth, this is its resting-place. It is hard to stifle rising queries as to the inequalities of creatures so apparently equally formed as ourselves and the diners, or to quell the envy which privation may almost be allowed to indulge in towards excess of luxuries. Yet the columns of the paper I have alluded to have just put forth a hideous complaint from these apparently happy creatures. Columns that would make reasons in an ordinary booth, have been devoted to the wailings of the want of a dinner—that is, such a dinner as a gentleman of a thousand a year can eat. It appears that the high and mighty, the lofty great and grossly idle, of the luxurious classes perish in the midst of want. They live in the mechanism of enchantment, and realise the fables which most tell of the wicked. They have plenty and cannot eat; their opportunity destroys riches into the gorge so that the stomach loathes them, and the great leader writer denounces them as abominations and vile productions. It seems that to dine completely every day of one's existence requires an income of £5,000 a year, which is to be spent all upon one's self, without the incumbrance of a family, and without the interference of any other fine tastes, whether Christian or heathen.—According to the income-tax returns, therefore, but a few thousands out of every thirty millions can ever dine at all—at least decently. To us therefore, fellow workmen, not repine that so many of us do not always dine, for it is evidently a luxury granted to the extreme few. Let us be contented, with the many calling themselves our betters, to eat and not to dine.

Others, however, do not seem inclined to share our contentment and resignation; and a gentleman of a thousand a year is exceedingly troubled that he cannot have a dinner to-day. This, however, I imagine, is not a matter of real appetite, but pride. He lives in Gower-street, and is greatly mortified that the well-to-do traders of that locality should not be able to dine in the same manner as the lords of Berkeley-square. He, however, puts his sufferings into very pathetic language, and tells us that he frequently goes out to dine under the false pretence of dining, but that he for ever finds roast beef and boiled turkey, lamb and chickens, fish and fowl; and a pretence at real dining, in some made dishes called entrees. Then he has to wait until he is served, and in the end loses his temper at the cruel treatment; and, indeed, he is so angry at the thought of his endurances, that he abruptly concludes his letter to the editor in a towering passion.

The end and aim of the whole correspondence is to show that fowl and ham, ducks and green peas, roast beef and mealy potatoes, saddle of mutton and pigeon pies, breast of lamb and sucking pig, turkey and chine, goose and apple sauce, are all barbarisms that the modern man of wealth will not any longer be doomed to feed upon. He will rather starve, as the Cow-cross mother and her five children do. An irreverent tongue might, in its inconsiderate haste or hunger, say, "And so let him," but the workhouse dependant is humble, and may, perchance, pity him; and a working philosopher, like myself, feels the infinite distinction which cookery makes between the inhabitants of this mundane sphere. It is a mystery of a most solemn kind to know how such a being as myself became located in the same planet as the G. H. M. of Berkeley-square, seraphic cook and divine stomach, digestion, and all other processes seem the same, but, alas! how absurd the idea of likeness. The elements do not differ any more; the creatures of earth and heaven are not further part. What do I know of eating and drinking beyond the coarse feelings of hunger and thirst? Why, I never dined in my life. I have eaten my lamb without melon; my capron had no marrons; my ducklings no olives; there was no pineapple to my vollaile sante au supreme (whatever that may be.) My humble tripe has never been served a la Russe, nor has it been varied by thirteen other plats. I am a perfect beast, as degraded as Nebuchadnezzar was grazing, or a Fedgee chief when tearing out the entrails of his enemy to glut at once his vengeance and his appetite, at least in the eyes of G. H. M. Indeed, what must such sublime beings think of the wretches who drink porter to their beef-steak and onions, when he is horrified at the thought of Rhine wine with roast beef, Hermitage with lamb, Moselle with wild-fowl, or Champagne with fish? What errors, what crimes against taste might all of us fall into if we were admitted into the halls of our lords. But they happily live in a region remote from all vulgar thoughts. Enwrapped in a perpetual steam of the most savoury odors, they live alone to eat; reversing with the utmost contempt of the moralist, his axiom that they should merely eat to live.

It may a little console us when ruminating on our bread and cheese rations, that the scientific diners are very much circumscribed, and that a really good dinner can only be safely counted upon by one who has £30,000 a year, with many man cooks, every appliance, and a fixed number of covers for every day, including Sundays in the year. When I reflect on my profoundly humble culinary condition, I feel I dare not even approach the door of the back kitchen of such an establishment—that it is even a kind of blasphemy for such as me to look down the area of such an earthly god. No wonder classes are separated; it is cookery that divides them. Pride of ancestry dwindles into insignificance, as regards its force, before the pride of the pantry. The lowly are no longer kept down by genealogies and rent-rolls; they are no longer warned off the precincts of the great by ancestral pride and supercilious menials, but by menus, penned with the choicest crowquill, revealing the dinner.—Cooks, not chamberlains, preserve the dignity of the great, and make us poor wretches feel that we may creep about and find ourselves very dishonourable graves, but there is a divinity in cooking that hedges the governing class into a parterre of good living that we cannot—that we dare not—enter.

Being thus shut out irrevocably and irremediably, there is nothing left but to submit. We must abandon dining altogether and very much circumscribe our eating. As we cannot share the Destitution of the Wealthy let us try to sympathise with the Destitution of the Poor; and, leaving Berkeley-square, take a turn in Cow Cross-street. Our sympathies have been so much racked by the sufferings of the thousand-a-year gentleman who loathes his friend's dinner, that we have, probably, but little left for the following group of distress:—The scene is laid in "Turnmill-street, a riverside locality, where a few dingy shops sell brandy, and on the thrones of one or two are seen 'cuttings' of bacon mixed up in little piles with fragmentary refuse of butchers's shops known among the poor as 'pieces.' On the right is a passage like a doorway called Glasgow-alley, the entrance to which is generally blocked up with boys and girls of every age—in every grade of infancy and misery. Each house in the court seems full; rooms have lights in the rooms, some have not, but through all the broken windows stuffed with rags and paper, the voices of men, women, and children, in tones of suffering, entreaty or complaint, can always be heard, for every little den is occupied by many members of poor families. The stairs which gave access to the upper portion of these tenements are so foul and crazy that the visitor dreads to trust himself upon them, for they are only used to bear the thinnest and most emaciated forms. Let us however, ascend one, and take the first case we meet—any will do—one is sure to be a sample of all the rest. Groping your way up the steps, then, you enter a room where the ceiling is broken; the walls are foul and dirty, but, nevertheless, all parts which can be washed are scrubbed as white as labour can make them. Pacing too and fro with weary steps is a tall, thin woman, hushing an infant on her breast that is ill with scarlet fever. Huddled together near a dim fire of rags and cinders, the material of which they had been all day long collecting, are two poor little girls; in the corner of the room is an old mattress, which was sent them a few days since by a benevolent gentleman, but beyond this there is not a vestige of furniture or food in the place. The woman's tale is soon told, for it is a very common one. Her husband had been out of work a month, and while still wearily looking for it day by day, he slipped upon a piece of orange peel and fractured his ankle badly. He is in the hospital, and she is allowed two shillings a week and two loaves by the parish. Two shillings pay her rent, and the two loaves barely keep life within herself and children. When we saw them it was on Monday night, and none of them had tasted food since Sunday morning, when they had two pound of bread among them all. Yet the woman was full of hope, for she had a bread-ticket that would give her a quartern loaf next day, and they counted the minutes with hungry anxiety till the time of that little plenty should arrive."

The universal paper that admitted the pathetic account of the miseries of the wealthy in their dinner privations also gave the foregoing picture of the vulgar miseries of the poor; and it tells that it "is an every day sample of distress—London is full of such." And, indeed, the intelligent recorder gives us several more, which, however, can have but little interest for those who have just been lacerated by the distressing account of the miseries of the wealthy—how £30,000 a-year cannot absolutely secure every delicacy every day of the year; how £5,000 a-year is an uncertain [illegible] and how £1,000 a-year leads only to such repasts as put the possessor in a continual fever of disappointment and irritation.—Such woes entirely obliterate the common and vulgar miseries of Turnmill-street; and we should not say much for the head and heart of the low-born creature who moaned over the woes of the starving mother and children, whilst he withheld his more enlightened sympathy for the sufferings of the Berkeley-square and Gower-street diners-out.

As it may be daily expected that other miseries of the wealthy will be forcibly blazoned in the immortal broadsheet, I shall not attempt to raise any emotion on the general dwellings of the poor of the Clarkenwell district. I expect some connoisseur of upholstery and house building will lay bare the Destitution of the Wealthy in this respect, and in an equally pathetic way, as G. H. M. and his correspondents have shown their culinary woes.—Indeed we may still remember a very moving account of the distresses of royalty even as regards its nursery; and there are still extant some heartrending letters on the household miseries of the blood royal, who were nearly perishing on ten thousand a-year. However as the miseries of the lowly would be entirely obliterated by the sadder woes of the wealthy, it may be as well to get the start of them and give the vulgar account first. Here is another picture from the same paper:—

"Leaving the Cow-cross we again wander through alleys, visiting house after house, where every room discloses fresh scenes of woe, and where hunger and sickness seem to reign supreme, and ravage unchecked among their miserable occupants. We have gradually described a complete circle from the place at which we started, and are now again near the Field-lane Ragged School, where you can just hear the monotonous chant of the hungry infants, drawing forth, 'Twenty pence are one and eight pence,' and so on upwards until they reach amounts in pence which the poor children will never know save in their multiplication tables. Near here stands a wretched house, the old and broken stairs of which are almost dangerous to mount.—At the top garret of all, upon a floor so frail and shattered that it is no longer safe for say, six a poor woman with an infant across her knees and three children huddled close to her for warmth upon the floor around her. The place is deadly cold, for there is no fire in the room, but as the child is sick and dying, the mother has borrowed a small candle from a neighbor, and by its dim light watches in silence the painful working of her infants features. Her case is very sad."

One of these various miseries cries aloud for remedy, and is even deserving of mention in a Queen's speech and the notice of a Reformed Parliament, but whether it be the Destitution of the Wealthy, or the Destitution of the Poor, is not necessary to be declared by

LITTLEJOHN.

Colonial Governors and Government.

We have already mentioned the appointment of Mr. Dundas to the Government of Prince Edward Island. Mr. Dundas has for a number of years been in the British Parliament for the County of Linlithgow, in the Conservative interest. He has not at any time, however, taken an active part in politics. The only speech of his we can call to mind was a very brief one about four years ago, which surprised for him at the time the title of "Twenty-four pounder Dundas." The occasion was a debate, or conversation rather, in the House with reference to the disturbances in London in connection with Lord Grosvenor's Sunday Trading bill. Mr. Dundas thought "the trial of a twenty-four pounder on the pavement" would have brought the mob to their senses. The foolish suggestion was loudly execrated by the press of all parties. This is the only time Mr. Dundas has ever figured in public that we can recollect, and his appearance on this solitary occasion was not, one would think, specially adapted to recommend him to the appointment of Governor in a colony making the experiment of popular institutions. Mr. Dundas, we believe, is a very estimable individual in his own way, but it is not a way that specially qualifies him for the delicate task with which he has now been intrusted.—That twenty-four pounder speech suggests unpleasant ideas as to how the speaker may conduct himself under circumstances requiring above all things that his mind should be free from any of the entanglements of arbitrary doctrines and ways of thinking.

We do not refer to this matter with a view to prejudice Mr. Dundas in the minds of the islanders. Possibly enough he may prove quite a favorite among them, and we hope he will. Our only object is to point a moral on the subject of Colonial Governors; and the moral is that they ought to be of a different stamp from those now selected. In the American colonies, at least, we have happily seen the last of the military Governors, who are the very worst of all. But in the change from retired officers of the army to the failures in British politics it cannot be said that there has been any very decided improvement. To gratify the desire of the Sancho Panzas for islands to govern, is not much better than inflicting military Don Quixotes on the communities. What is there in the art and practice of government in new countries, with constitutional forms of administration recently inaugurated, that the narrow heads who are unable to make way in the field of home politics should be almost invariably selected for the office? In England it seems to be generally supposed to be adequate to the task. We were amused the other day by the remark of a correspondent of a Scotch paper, that Mr. Dundas, although he had been a nonentity as a member of Parliament, "would make a very good Governor!" A sarcasm was perhaps intended. The remark, however, expressed the idea practically acted upon in Colonial appointments. Except in an occasional rare instance like that of Lord Elgin the most unfit men are sent to govern the Colonies,— way of their being the right men in the right place. In nine cases out of ten we have the square man in the round hole; the man of narrow intellect and red-tape notion, where breadth of view and intuitive sagacity, and practised tact are necessary—those qualities, in short, which make what we call a sound man. Among the most favorable specimens of the class usually chosen have been the Heads, Sir Francis and Sir Edmund, both clever men—the one a brilliant writer, the other an acute one—but yet both of them far from being the sort of men who should be made Governors of free colonies, as those who believe in phrenology might almost tell from a preliminary observation.

The Governors now forming the only link, it may be said, that binds the different Provinces to the parent State, the selection of the right men to fill the office is of the last importance. Unfortunately it is not a very easy thing to get good men to accept such appointments; for there are few able men who will abandon their prospects in the world of British politics for any colonial appointment, however honorable or lucrative. Were a more numerous class of talented men induced to devote themselves to the public service, perhaps this difficulty might be overcome, but certainly the present race of politicians who consider a London residence among the necessaries of life are not likely to be induced to incur what they reckon the discomfort of life in a colony unless as a matter of necessity.—Doubtless the blanks may in some cases turn out in good prizes and men who have not succeeded in British politics may prove excellent Governors nevertheless. But we must look to the general rule in such cases, which is certainly not calculated to afford a supply of Governors likely to strengthen the connection with the mother country. In the case of responsible government there is a difficult part to be played, requiring above all things much tact and knowledge of the world. Without such qualifications a Governor only imperils British connection, for every time he commits an error people are naturally led to speculate on the uselessness of an office which causes irritation and annoyance without yielding any apparent practical benefit. No doubt under the constitutional system the Governor must more and more tend to become a mere nonentity, but it would be well to have men with sense enough to recognise this inevitable tendency and the discretion to steer their course accordingly. How this is to be obtained in the case of all the separate colonies it is difficult to see, and hence the desirableness of removing at as early a period as possible the distinctions that now separate the Provinces into so many independent governments. A statesman of the first class could no doubt be found who would be proud of a great confederacy, or one of the royal family, if possessed of royal judgment like the present sovereign, would very fitly occupy such a position. The Lieutenant-Governorships would then properly be abolished, and a risk of dissatisfaction would thus be avoided which, it cannot be concealed or denied, is a serious drawback to the present system of sub-divided government.

Bankruptcy Laws.

(From the Times.)

A Reform of the Law of Bankruptcy and Insolvency is one of the measures projected for discussion during the present session. We rather hope for a settlement than believe in it. We cannot forget how often this subject has been brought forward, how often it has been remitted for enquiry, how often the enquiry has proved barren of result. We now have in presence mainly two systems,—the one is Lord Chelmsford's; the other that one which is based on the recommendations of various important commercial bodies—in fact, the legal and the commercial schemes. The general impression appears to be that Lord Chelmsford's voluminous proposition on the subject will scarcely bear discussion. We need, above all things, simplicity, and here is complication; clearness, and here is obscurity. On the other hand, it is much to be apprehended that if the question were decided according to the wishes of commercial men the Bankruptcy code would virtually cease to exist. What they ask for seems to be in the main the sanction of a competent court to obviate arrangements. What they chiefly appear to dread is publicity. But it may be said, why, since the Bankruptcy Laws are principally devised for the protection of traders, should not their desires be accepted as conclusive on the subject? Have they an interest in this matter which is adverse to the general interest of the community? The answer to this question certainly is that, as a class, commercial men are more vitally and more deeply interested than other persons in a due administration of the Bankrupt Laws; but yet, so great is their horror of publicity, they would sooner put up with losses. They had rather leave fraud to run its course unchecked than submit to the exposure of their own mistakes. Their argument is, that if they choose to manage their own concerns in their own way—to write off a loss rather than communicate the fact to the public—it is their own business, and concerns nobody but themselves. A merchant in the course of his business enters into some unfortunate speculation, undertakes some enterprise which results in a dead loss, but; while still remaining solvent he has a perfect right to keep the story of his reverse to himself. Why should he injure his own credit? By parity of reasoning, if in an unguarded moment he has given trust to an adventurer, and thereby suffered damage, is he bound to come forward and proclaim the fact to the world? Are we to have no middle course open to him between submitting to the entire loss of his debt and full exposure of the circumstances in the public journals? It may well be that if notice be given of the loss he has incurred his own creditors may be inclined to run him hard. He may not find the same facilities for discount and the same ample credit as before, because it will be believed that he is embarrassed by the loss. There is something plausible in this at first sight, but the reasoning breaks down in face of gives a false appearance of solvency is complete, which enables men, who, by their own imprudence have been defrauded to slip their own necks out of the collar at the expense of others, cannot in the long run be advantageous to the community at large. Which is best—that trade should rest upon a sure or upon a rotten foundation?

Now, we are not defending the Bankrupt Laws as they stood, nor as they stand,—We can well understand that the traders should have shrunk from bringing their claims before a tribunal where such frightful complications existed. There also used to be the great argument on the score of expense. The assets under the good old arrangements used to be swallowed up in costs. Why should a man undergo all the discomfort, and loss of time, and exasperation of prosecuting a claim before a Court which in the end either could not or would not afford him relief in the only form which he appreciated—a substantial dividend?—This argument, however, has lost much of its force in our own day. We do not believe that the Bankruptcy Law, as administered by the present Commissioners and Official Assignees, is fairly obnoxious to the reproach of being an expensive system.—The concerns of a bankrupt's estate will be as fairly and economically wound up in Basinghall-street as under any system of private arrangement which could be devised. But then there is the publicity! It is difficult to see how this can be avoided with fairness to all parties and to the public, who are not parties at all to the transactions between the bankrupt and his creditors.—What certainty is there that there shall be no undue preference—that there shall be punishment inflicted for positive offence against the criminal law, unless the bankrupt be examined and evidence received in open court? Surely it will not be contended, if a bankrupt has not surrendered, has not discovered all his estate, has not delivered up his books, has destroyed or falsified them, has concealed available property, has obtained goods under false pretences when he was hopelessly insolvent, or has given false testimony in the course of the investigation into his affairs, that he ought not to be punished? If this be so we may as well give up our criminal law altogether, for it would then be assumed that punishment does not operate to deter from crime. Should it be left to the discretion of his creditors whether he should be punished or not? Scarcely so, for in that case every rogue who was entering upon a career of fraud would buoy himself up with the expectation that his creditors would avoid the trouble and expense of a prosecution. The only way in which justice can be administered is, by a competent and impartial Court. How far commercial men of the highest standing and of the most unimpeachable character can go in the concealment of crime when such a course appears calculated to promote their own interests we know by lamentable proof. It was but the other day that such an instance occurred in the city of London has not yet recovered from the shame.

To-day we have subjected this subject for remark because the House is not sitting when Parliament will reasonably the despatch of business and there is no measure of merely domestic import which should receive a hearing or more serious attention from the Legislature than this one of the Bankrupt Law. We have, therefore, a special reason for bringing the subject to-day under the notice of our readers. Mr. Commissioner Fane, one of the Bankruptcy Commissioners, has for the laws of Bankruptcy and Insolvency. His observations will be found in another portion of our journals this day. We do not endorse these views in all particulars; but, proceeding as they do from a gentleman who has had such extensive experience of the subject on which he treats, they are at least worthy of attention. Mr. Commissioner Fane, perhaps, pushes to extreme the judicial view. He is for complete publicity in all instances; but it can scarcely be doubted that, if he admitted no exceptions to this rule, he would oftentimes defeat his own object. The keystone of his proposition is, that where private arrangements are proposed the minority of the creditors should not be found by the majority; nay, that the voice of one dissentient creditor should be sufficient to enforce publicity. Commissioner Fane's theory it is best, perhaps, to state in his own words. "There is nothing so agreeable to an insolvent and his creditors as secrecy—nothing so disagreeable as publicity. The debtor is only too often a knave, the creditors almost all victims of their own readiness to give credit without inquiry. The debtor hates to have his knavery, the creditor hates to have his folly exposed. They are in a conspiracy against honest men, and their engine is secrecy." This view will, no doubt be distasteful enough in the city. It is greatly to be feared that, until the public opinion of commercial men runs to an overwhelming degree on the side of fair trading, anything like a sound system of bankruptcy law will be an impossibility.—Where all parties are determined to evade the law or set it at defiance success will generally crown their endeavors. Were the public opinion of the country sound upon commercial fraud there would be no great difficulty in framing a law to reprase it.

Lola Montez In Liverpool.

On Monday night Lola Montez appeared before a Liverpool audience as a lecturer. She read her paper with deliberate distinctness, and forcible enunciation, in a rich mellow voice, quite free from harshness, and plaintive even in emphasis and exclamation.

Lola Montez said the difference between the English and American people was less marked in the New England States, the populations of which were almost entirely descended from English Americans, but became more and more observable as you moved westward among new settlements, where they had a people whom we could not here originate. Though the better class of Americans were proud of owning Great Britain as their home, it was not unnatural that they should be found scolding each other and indulging in the strange contrasts of habits and customs. Prominent amongst these, so disgusting to an English lady, was the almost universal habit of spitting, prevalent in the States, of which indeed the spittoon was one of the institutions; but though the question of saliva might fairly occupy the attention of diplomacy for the next quarter of a century, in place of Mosquitto quarrels, it was happily gradually disappearing in the drawing-rooms of Boston, Philadelphia, and New York. Volatile and enthusiastic in their feelings, the Americans were easily thrown into a state of universal feverish excitement, during which they literally worshipped their idols, and as easily relapsed into a state of calm, in which their indifference was as profound as their enthusiasm had been ecstatic. In illustration she referred to the reception given in America to Kossouth, who was afterwards plunged in such an abyss of infamy and abuse as no man ever rested on before—[hisses]—they first made a god of him, and then converted him into a demon.

On the laying of the Atlantic cable, the Americans took to themselves all the glory; there was a telegraphic wit driving, and the people danced with a kind of galvanic delight; the "mighty Cyrus,"—[laughter]—was almost deified; but now his three days' glory—[laughter]—was gone. The Americans had more activity and go-a-headitiveness—[laughter]—and spirit than the English, who, however, had more strength and substance. Indeed, the characteristic of the American was "speed," whilst that of the Englishman was "strength." The American was formidable in attack—the Englishman in defence. The Englishman, though beaten, was still formidable, but a beaten American was good for nothing.—The no-capital principle was a peculiarity of America. A broken-down tradesman could enter the learned professions of law or medicine with three months' study, and be at the head of his profession in six months afterwards—[laughter],—and these professions are made of broken-down merchants, horse jockeys, prize-fighters, and adventurers. The element of "speed" entered even into religion, which, like everything else went by steam, its professors travelled by an express railway train to glory. There was no place in the world where public opinion was so great a tyrant, and where an unpopular cause was branded with so much infamy. The time of a woman's gaiety in America was when she was unmarried.—"But," said Lola, with suggestive emphasis, "when the choice is made,"—[roars of laughter]—good bye to her freedom and happiness. She must be submissive to her husband, become a good wife, and so forth. If I were a man—[renewed laughter]—I, said if—I would prefer an American girl to flirt with, but I should choose an English girl to marry—[applause]. Courting is a delightful affair in America. I dare say men think it so in this country, but they have not been in America."

She attributed the diversity of religious sects in the States to the prevalence of the cheap press, and the reading habits of the people. Beyond their smartness and versatile enthusiasm, however, was to be seen, when age had sobered down the eccentricities of youth, the great and glorious spirit of liberty with which the heart of American people was baptised. The accessibility of the highest posts to the humblest, exalted the ambition of all, and expanded the energies and intelligence of the people to an extent of which they had little conception; and though there might be social customs in America that would shock English notions of propriety, they were only the dust gathered on the garment as she rolled onward in the pathway of nations, which would be removed as she grew older; and England might well be proud of such a young republic. Not only was she bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, but she was their only true ally in the church of civilization and freedom. Their newspapers may fight and quarrel, and diplomacy might intrigue, but they might rest assured that the American would never let the quarrel go further. At present there was a great smell of bunkum but little of powder, and it was to be regretted that amongst American politicians at that moment there was scarcely a genuine feeling of patriotism. The maxims of American statesmanship were—first, "How to get into office; second, how to keep in office; third, the country is a great and glorious one, and is able to take care of itself, and therefore we have nothing to do but to take care of ourselves.'—Such were the maxims of the present race of politicians, whose cunning blinded their sagacity, and who looked only to their own aggrandisement instead of the welfare of their country; but as in the past, when the destinies of the people were guided by a Jackson, a Webster, a Colhoun, and a Clay, so in the future would arise some true-hearted men equal to the task before them; and whether the permanent institutions of America retained the form of a republic or took that of a representative monarchy, they would find there the home of freedom. She would be their most powerful ally, and, united, who could fear either France or Russia, with the world besides? (Applause.)

The reading of the lecture lasted an hour. Lola Montez retired immediately amidst loud applause, prolonged until she returned to acknowledge it; and it was then announced that she would again appear before a Liverpool audience in the same hall, and deliver her lecture on "The Comic Aspects of Fashion."

Wholesale Robbery—Mother and Daughters.

On Wednesday, at the Marlborough-street police-court, Emma Smith, aged nineteen, Ellen Smith, thirteen, and Emma Smith, thirty-eight, were charged, the two first, who are the daughters of the latter, with stealing a vast quantity of property, consisting of valuable foreign toys, jewellery and other articles, belonging to their employer, Mr. William Henry Cremer, importer of goods, and proprietor of the German Fair Bazaar, Regent-street, and the mother with receiving the said property with a guilty knowledge.

Mr. Cremer said: The two younger prisoners have been in my service for about three months as stallwomen, each in a different room, and having different counters. I should state that during the temporary absence of the younger of these two, a young female, who has part charge of a counter, accidentally made a discovery through the upsetting of the prisoner's bag, which she had placed on one side to take away, and communicated with me in consequence.—By my direction, nothing was then said, and all was kept quiet until seven in the evening, when I called both prisoners, and questioned them as to my property seen in their bag. I told them that certain articles from stock had been found secreted, and expressed a wish to see the pockets of the younger.—She replied she had only her money, and began fumbling in her pocket as she sat down; insisting, however, she gave up the small china ornaments produced, and the dozen wax figures, and other articles were found in her bag. She said she was going to pay for them. I said, "No, you were going out of the building with them." I then told them I should accompany them home, and examine their lodgings, to see if they had anything there belonging to the establishment. They both assured me nothing would be found, for they had never taken away any property. Finding me determined, they submitted, and as we went I again questioned them, and they persisted they had never taken anything. Of three keys in the younger prisoner's pocket, she said one was that of her work-box. She added, when reaching their residence, No. 41 Mornington-place, Hampstead-road, that I should only find a few presents from their grandmother, godmothers, uncles, and friends. I was shown into a back room, which was in a wretched and miserable condition, by the eldest prisoner, their mother, and the first things that met my view were two figures on the mantelshelf, imported by myself. The youngest prisoner said she had bought them of Mrs. Cremer. From the abject state of poverty indicated by the place, I doubted that being so, and told them so and why. Permission granted, I looked into a cupboard, and found, but in a very dirty state, the box of china tea service produced, and this varied lot of foreign toys. I had explained to the eldest prisoner that something unpleasant had occurred respecting her daughters, and she had gone up stairs. She had now been a long time absent, and I caused her to be called for.—After this had been done repeatedly, she made her re-appearance with two workboxes, one of which was locked. On opening both, they were found to contain articles of perfumery, chains, &c.; in one was the papier machie portmonnaie produced, which, with the rest, I identify. Ellen said it was her grandfather's present; one of the articles, I know to have been stolen a few days previously. I asked if they would tell me how they came by the bottles of expensive perfume, and Ellen said a gentleman had given them to her. On further search I discovered five more bottles of perfume; these, she said, she had taken from her counter.

The prosecutor then described various other articles found, also his property. Besides all this property, amounting in the aggregate to a considerable sum, there was a very large quantity of wearing apparel for ladies' wear, and bought evidently at shops, as they, the younger prisoners, have gone home; and on this subject I must add, with embezzled money for goods sold over the counter by them—money unaccounted for. The most serious part of the affair is, that recently I gave admission to the children of the British Orphan Asylum, and a treat to them at the same time. I took much interest in this, being a life governor in the charity, and while these poor orphans were around the orchestra, the prisoner Emma, the younger, came in the greatest apparent alarm, and declared she had all her stall cleared of toys and other things by the children who had surrounded it. I was quite certain that nothing of the sort had taken place, and I now produce same boxes and other property, then alleged to have been stolen by the children, among the articles found at the prisoners' residence, amongst which was a quantity of goods from the different glass-cases. I told the mother I would afford her the opportunity of coming to the bazaar, and accounting for the property being found in her possession, if she were able; but she replied she felt far too agitated then, and that she should not leave home. I took possession of all the property I could identify, and afterwards communicated with the police, and with the officers went a second time to the house, where still more property was discovered, and I gave them all three into custody. I find I have been robbed since the younger prisoners have been in my service to a fearful extent, and that there is besides a considerable deficit in money accounts on the two younger prisoners' parts. It should be mentioned that the lodgings of the prisoners presented a scene of poverty little in keeping with the large quantity of valuable dress found there.

The prisoners declined to put any questions to the prosecutor. A gentleman, who said he was acquainted with the prisoners, and lodged at the house, hoped opportunity would be given for legal advice. Mr. Beadon said, certainly. It was a most important case, and he should remand it for a week.

The Chances of War.

There appears to be some abatement of the war panic, although we are unable to discover any appreciable change in the situation. We said at the commencement of the recent discussions, that whatever might be the personal ambition of the Emperor Napoleon, or however strong his desire to shed a halo of military glory around his dynasty, there are considerations which must make him pause before he ventures to draw the sword. The Cabinets of Europe are averse to war, for none of the old monarchies are in a position to bear the drain of men and money. They are all embarrassed by financial pressure and internal discontent, and they have enough to do at home. It may be regarded as certain that the whole diplomacy of power is exerted for the preservation of peace. Napoleon III. might disregard remonstrances or entreaties coming from abroad, but he is not indifferent to the opinions of France. The French people are not deficient in military ardour, but they do not like interruption of trade, war taxes, and an exhausting conscription. It has been said that the Emperor has been entreated to avert these evils from his country. The mere apprehension of war led to a panic, and we are told that at a recent Cabinet Council one of the Ministers declared that if the same state of things continued for a month there would be no more than a thousand failures in Paris. A correspondent in that capital writes:—"I am assured that the reports of the Prefects of Departments, received up to the latest date and purporting to give the sentiments of the population of their respective districts, are decided in their reprobation of war. These reports, it may be remembered, emanate from men who might suppose it to be to their interest to flatter whatever they thought prevailed in the highest quarter; but, even under such circumstances, they do not venture to make statements which could be at once contradicted.—These reports, then, if I am correctly informed, set forth not merely disapprobation, but horror, among the population at the bare notion of a war for Italy, which would soon become European." From these premises it is argued that the Emperor Napoleon, if he ever seriously contemplated a campaign in Italy, has abandoned the idea. Austria, too, has yielded on the Servian question, and diplomacy whispers that all causes of misunderstanding have been removed.

But still preparations are going on at Toulon, orders are given for a large supply of coals for the navy, and rumors are current that more than a hundred vessels are required to be ready to serve as transports. Still, the Paris papers continue to discuss the questions of peace or war, and fluctuations are rife on the Bourse. It is rumored that General Lamoriciere has offered his sword to the Emperor, and that Pelissier and Canrobert, although opposed to war, do not like to see rivals coming into the field. General MacMahon is holding festival at Algiers, but the whole African Contingent is held ready for embarkation. These are not peaceful signs.

It is suggested that the key of the situation is no longer held at Paris, but at Vienna. Austria has consented to abstain from interference in Servia, and so far she is pacific. In Italy, however, she is gathering her military power, apparently resolved to meet Italian discontent with more rigorous suppression. The Lombards are mute and tranquil, because they expect war. In Piedmont the speeches of public men and the newspapers are full of warlike fervour. The troops have been called in from the outposts and from the island of Sardinia to be concentrated between Turin and the frontier of Lombardy. Garibaldi is organizing volunteers, a national guard of fifteen thousand men has been called out, and officers and soldiers who fought in Rome and Lombardy in 1849 have received commissions. Defiance of Austria is the ruling sentiment in Piedmont. "Now then," says one newspaper, "we have a war decided at last. We shall, before long, find ourselves side by side with the red trousers, and the white coats in front of us; the matter is very nearly certain." The Austrians are converging on the frontier of Piedmont, and the officers say that at the first sign of revolt they are to march against the Sardinians. An outbreak may happen in Lombardy at any moment, Austria and Piedmont would be immediately engaged, and the French would soon be in the field. Our contemporaries who cry "peace," are at least premature. A leading journal hints that in the event of war in Italy, England would join in a European combination against France. Not so. What England could or might do we will not venture to predict, but we known what she will not do. England will not join with Austria for the oppression of Italy.—London Times.

The Missing Ballet Girl.

A ROMANCE IN THREE CHAPTERS.

There are still multitudes who are not free from the delusion of the stage, and to whom the drama is for the time a reality. They go to the theatre not to lounge or to criticise, but to be moved, to be aroused, or to be amused. They do not care to unmask the actor, but resolutely believe in the character of the hour. They grieve with Desdemona, they pity Othello, and they execrate Iago with true honest feeling, and without a thought of the Miss Smith, the Mr. Brown and the Mr. Robinson who represent the mighty creations of Shakespeare. They enjoy the pantomime thoroughly, heartily, and with genuine laughter, and they do not refuse their admiration to the more refined and gorgeous burlesque. When the stage is covered with troops of fairies they forget for the moment, that the graceful forms floating before their eyes in clouds of semi-transparent gauze are only "the ladies of the ballet." As the lithe and agile figures move rapidly through the intricate mazes of the dance, soar aloft without visible support or break into variegated groups, enveloped in floral wreaths, the imagination of the spectator transforms them into veritable denizens of fairy-land. It seems impossible that they can live and move like ordinary human beings, with the same wants and the same joys and sorrows. When the green curtain falls upon the last resplendent scene, the young go away with a vague notion that the fairies they have been privileged to look upon depart to the "dazzling realms of love and light," or to some other region of fairy-land, to be fed upon nectar and ambrosia, and to recline upon rose-leaves until again summoned before the footlights by the wand of the enchanter. But there is another side to the picture. The fairies of the ballet do not always wear gauze and spangles or reflect the brilliant rays of coloured lights. Who would recognise them in the close bonnet, the coarse dress, the thick shawl and the clogs in which they emerge from the stage door. After all they are mortal; they are poorly paid, and they often return to mean home, where perhaps, a sickly mother, with two or three young children, mainly depends upon the earnings of the ballet girl. And they do not escape scandal—but here we pause merely observing that we believe they are misunderstood and maligned as a class, and that there may be found among them numerous examples of virtuous poverty struggling with temptation. At the best their lot is not enviable, and it is often pitiable.—But turning from generals to particulars, we come upon a romance got up perhaps unintentionally, by one of their number, and which has created a sensation in London for more than a week.

The first chapter opens in the Lambeth police-court, before Mr. Norton the magistrate and he is addressed by Mrs. Ann Newell She is a widow now residing in Stangate, Westminster, but she has seen better days. Her husband was a tradesman, who for many years carried on business in Clare-market and who died leaving her with three little girls, wholly unprovided for. Her application to the magistrate concerns the eldest daughter, Jane Newell, now in her eighteenth year. It appears that soon after the death of the father, Jane then sixteen years old, was engaged at the Olympic Theatre as a dancer, at twenty shillings a week, and subsequently migrated to Her Majesty's Theatre, when that house was re-opened by Mr Lumley. At the latter establishment she gave such evidence of talent, that M. Massot proposed to take her as a pupil; and, with the consent of her mother she was articled to him for three years. When Mr. Lumley retired from the theatre, M. Massot desired that the indentur s should be cancelled, and after some negotiation, the apprenticeship was prematurely brought to an end When that was effected, however, all the theatres had completed their engagements and Jane Newell could not obtain any employment in her occupation. The family of course, suffered from the loss of her earnings, and the mother tells the magistrate that she supported her children by needlework, and that Jane helped by doing some embroidery. All this is bad enough, but the worst comes, for Jane disappeared mysteriously on the 5th of January, and the mother cannot find her. The girl had been desponding. "We had a tolerably good meal," says the mother, "on the day when my poor child eft, of some bits I bought in the New-cut; but the poor child was very low-spirited for having no engagement. On the night of Tuesday week she addressed me, saying, 'Oh, mother, what are we to do for the four months I am to be out of a situation? We had better take a pennyworth of something that will put us out of our misery. We had better be in Heaven than in this wretched state.' To which I replied 'Oh, Jenny, don't think of such a thing; you know there is a God above us." In the evening she left taking a note her mother had written to a lady in Soho-square. The note was not delivered and Jane Newell did not return. The mother has sought her everywhere, at the police stations, at the hospitals, without success. She speaks highly of the moral rectitude of the girls character, and she is overwhelmed with grief. Mr. Norton is touched, he gives assistance from the poor-box of the court to the afflicted mother and he requests the press to assist by publishing her case. In less than four-and-twenty hours the history of Jane Newell as told by the mother, is known all over the metropolis. Aid is offered from many quarters, managers write to offer engagements if she can be found, and subscriptions flow in from the benevolent. One manager sends two sovereigns enclosed in a letter, in which he expresses his satisfaction that the case has been made public as "it will satisfy the numerous readers of the newspapers that artists of this description, who unfortunately have no other occupations to follow, continue as virtuous on the stage as in any other situation that females have recourse to for obtaining a livelihood." Days pass without tidings of Jane Newell and public sympathy continues unabated.

We are still at Lambeth police-court, in the second chapter; the time, Monday last. Jane Newell appears upon the scene. She is "tall for her age, of a graceful figure, with rather fair complexion, and dark hair and eyes" The appearance of the heroine is in her favour, but "her manner in making her statement is rather gay and forward." She tells a most extraordinary and incredible story to the following effect:—On the evening she left her mother's house, and as she was passing over Westminister bridge on her way to Soho, she met one Emily Hobbs. Now Miss Hobbs had belonged to the ballet at Drury-lane Theatre, and Jane Newell had known her for a twelvemonth. The greeting was cordial, and the two talked over their prospects. Emily Hobbs was also without an engagement, but she had one offered to her at Plymouth, which she would not accept. She advised Jane to "keep up her spirits," and conducted her to the Red Lion public-house, in Parliament-street, where she gave her a glass of sherry. Only one glass, for Jane refused a second, which was proffered to her by her generous friend. It happened curiously enough, that Emily was also going to call upon a lady friend, and invited Jane to accompany her. This "lady friend" was a Mrs. Ellis, residing in Seymour-terrace, Pimlico, and thither the two went in a cab. Mrs. Ellis was fortunately at home, and she received Jane Newell with exuberant kindness. Emily Hobbs spoke apart with the lady of the house, and then went away. Mrs. Ellis at once took Jane to her heart. It was too late and she could not return home that night. She was to make the house her own, and to be the companion of her mistress. By staying there she could do more for her mother than by taking an engagement. She was installed in "a very nice apartment, indeed," and consented to remain with the good Mrs. Ellis. This lady lived in very fine style, keeping a footman and two women-servants the other intimates of the house were Miss Stanley, a dressmaker, and a little boy, Mrs Ellis's son. She did not preserve strict seclusion, for gentlemen sometimes called, and were shown into the drawing room.—Jane Newell was not introduced to them, and was chiefly occupied with crochet work After she had been in the house for ten days it was proposed to her by Mrs. Ellis that the visitors should be introduced, but the girl firmly declined the opportunity of making their acquaintance. All this time she was a prisoner, though well treated.—Once she went out with Mrs. Ellis to Brompton, to buy a bonnet. She wrote one letter to her mother, and gave it to the servant to put in the post-receiver, but it never reached its destination. On Saturday she went by the leave of Mrs. Ellis, to Her Majesty's Theatre, "thinking she might hear of her mother there," and asked for her practising dress. The fireman showed her a newspaper containing a report of her mother's statement at the police-court, and she told him that she had been married for three weeks, and resided in St. James's-square. On Sunday evening she returned to her mother. She solemnly declares "in the presence of her God" that nothing of an improper character occurred while she was in Mrs. Ellis's house. Such is the story told to the experienced magistrate, and he refuses belief. He will investigate, and meanwhile, he withholds the money sent to him by benevolent persons for mother and daughter. If Jane Newell's statement be true, the law will lay its grasp on Mrs. Ellis.

Again at the police-court in the third chapter. Other persons appear, and the plot thickens. Mrs. Ellis is there in obedience to a summons. She is middle-aged, "dumpy" in figure and expensively dressed. A Mr. Smith accompanies her—"a man at least fifty years of age, with his face covered with hair, and in the garb of a gentleman"—to be afterwards hooted by the crowd assembled in court. Emily Hobbs cannot be found. Wagborne, the summoning officer has made diligent inquiries at all the London theatres, and cannot discover any trace of such a person. Jane Newell is called and cross-examined by a solicitor on behalf of Ellis. She admits that the tale about Emily Hobbs is a fiction. It comes out that Smith took her to the house of Ellis. She knew the character of the place, and conformed to its customs. She was not pure when she went there. A letter is produced written to her "dear Mrs. Ellis," in which she promises to stay with her altogether "with my mother's consent." She confesses much more that will be found in the report, and we will pass by the details which cover mother and daughter with shame. Mrs. Ellis is dismissed, and the curtain falls on a painful and unexpected denouement.

It is terrible to contemplate a mother, however deep in distress sharing the wages of her daughters infamy, but over them we may throw the veil of charity, for we know not how sorely they may have been tempted. There are others who may not escape our execration. Mr. Norton is of opinion that "much misery and consequent immorality arises from the manner of employing persons at theatres," and he recommends managers to look sharply after the persons to whom the making of engagements is entrusted. There is a large amount of truth in his remark so far as it goes, but the evil lies deeper. Mrs. Ellis is able to live in a handsome house, to keep a footman and other servants. Whence does she derive her income—who are her employers? She is a traitor and a disgrace to womanhood, but she is only the agent and instrument of the vicious wealthy. Her occupation is loathsome and degrading, but are not the purchasers of her services also her accomplices? The indignation of the world is every ready against the fallen, let it be turned on the tempters. There is a hideous ulcer in the heart of society, and it is stimulated and fed by men who stand in the highest places. Enough has been said about the vices of the poor, and reformation to be effectual must begin from above.

The Begum's (or "Queen of Oude") Counter Proclamation.

The Begum of Oude has issued a counter proclamation, written in the finest Court Persian. The document is headed by a fine regal seal, and is in all respects, a regular oriental State paper. The following translation, though very cleverly made, is said to be still deficient in the subtlety and elegant diction of the original. It is remarked that its production affords sufficient proof that Queen Victoria's proclamation had reached Buraech, and that it was producing an effect which the Begum's party found essential to neutralise or destroy.

TRANSLATION.
(By order.)

"At this time certain weak-minded, foolish people have spread a report that the English have forgiven the faults and crimes of the people of Hindostan. This appears very astonishing, for it is the unvarying custom of the English never to forgive a fault be it great or small; so much so that if a small offence be committed through ignorance or negligence they never forgive it.

"The proclamation of the 1st of November, 1858, which has come before us is perfectly clear; and, as some foolish people not understanding the real object of the proclamation, have been carried away, therefore we, the ever abiding government parents of the people of Oude, with great consideration; put forth the present proclamation, in order that the real object of the chief points may be exposed and our subjects be placed on their guard.

"1. It is written in the proclamation that the country of Hindostan which was held in trust by the company, has been resumed by the Queen, and that for the future the Queen's laws should be obeyed. This is not to be trusted by our religious subjects, for the laws of the company, the settlement of the company, the English servant of the company, the governor-general, and the judicial administration of the company, are all unchanged. What, then, is there new which can benefit the people or on which they can rely?

"2. In the proclamation it is written that all contracts and agreements entered into by the company will be accepted by the Queen. Let the people carefully observe this artifice. The company has seized on Hindostan, and, if this arrangement be accepted, what is there new in it? The company professes to treat the Chief of Bhurtpore as a son, and then took his territory; the Chief of Lahore was carried of to London, and it has not fallen to his lot to return; the Nawab Shumshoodeen Khan on one side they hanged, and on the other side they took of their hats and salaamed to him the Peishwah they expelled from Poonah Sitara, and imprisoned for life in Bithoor; then their breach of faith with Sultan Tippoo in Agra. Under the pretence of administering the country of the Chief of Gwailor, they introduced English customs; they have left no name or trace of the chiefs of Behar, Orissa, and Bengal; they gave the Rajahs of Furruckabad a small monthly allowance, and took his territory, Shahjehanpore, Bareilly, Azimghur, Joonpore, Goruckpore, Etawah, Allahabad, Futtehpore, &c. Our ancient possessions they took from us on pretence of distributing pay and in the 7th article of the treaty they wrote an oath that they would take no more from us. If, then, the arrangements made by the company are to be accepted, what is the difference between the former and the present state of things? These are old affairs; but recently, in defiance of treaties and oaths, and notwithstanding that they owed us millions of rupees, without reason, and on the pretence of the misgovernment and discontent of our people, they took our country and property, worth millions of rupees. If our people were discontented with our royal predecessor, Wijid Ally Shah, how comes it they are content with us?—And no ruler ever experienced such loyalty and devotion of life and goods as we have done. What then is wanting that they do not restore our country?

"Further, it is written in the proclamation that they want no increase of territory, but yet they cannot refrain from annexation. If the Queen has assumed the government, why does her Majesty not restore our country to us when our people wish it? It is well known that no King or Queen ever punished a whole army or people for rebellion; all were forgiven, and the wise cannot approve of punishing the whole army and people of Hindostan, for, as long as the wrong-doer's punishment remains, the disturbance will not be suppressed. There is a well-known proverb—'A dying thief is despairate.' (Marte lupa ne hearta.) It is impossible that a thousand should attack a million, and the thousand escape.

"3. In the proclamation it is written that the Christian religion is true, but no other creed will suffer oppression, and that the laws will be observed by all. What has the administration of justice to do with the truth or falsehood of a religion? That religion is true that acknowledges one God and knows no other. Where there are three Gods in a religion, neither Mussulmans nor Hindoos—nay, not even Jews, one-worshippers, or five-worshippers can believe it true. To eat pigs and drink wine, to bite greased cartridges and to mix pig's fat with flour and sweetmeats, to destroy Hindoo and Mussulman temples on pretence of making roads, to build churches, to send clergymen into the streets and alleys to preach the Christian religion, to institute English schools, and pay people a monthly stipend for learning the English sciences, while the places of worship of Hindoos and Mussulmans are to this day entirely neglected; with all this, how can the people believe that religion will not be interfered with? The rebellion began with religion, and for it millions of men have been killed. Let not our subjects be deceived; thousands were deprived of their religion in the north-west, and thousands were hanged rather than abandon their religion.

"4. It is written in the proclamation, that they who harboured rebels, or who were leaders of rebels, or who caused men to rebel, shall lose their lives, but that punishment shall be awarded after deliberation, and that murderers and abettors of murderers, shall have no mercy shown them, while all others shall be forgiven. Any foolish person can see that, under this proclamation, no one, be he found guilty or innocent, can escape. Everything is written, and yet nothing is written, but they have clearly written that they will not let off any one implicated; and in whatever village or estate the army may have halted, the inhabitants of that place cannot escape. We are deeply concerned for the condition of our people, on reading this proclamation, which palpably teems with enmity. We now issue a distinct order, and one that may be trusted—that all subjects who may have foolishly presented themselves as heads of villages to the English, shall, before the 1st of January next, present themselves in our camp. Without doubt their faults shall be forgiven them, and they shall be treated according to their merits. To believe in this proclamation, it is necessary to remember that Hindostani rulers are altogether kind and merciful. Thousands have seen this—millions have heard it. No one has ever seen in a dream that the English forgave an offence.

"5. In this proclamation it is written, that when peace is restored, public works, such as roads and canals, will be made to improve the condition of the people. It is worthy of a little reflection, that they have promised no better employment for Hindostanees than making roads and digging canals. If people cannot see clearly what this means, there is no help for them. Let no subject be deceived by the proclamation.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

FRIDAY, February 18.

The Speaker took the chair at three o'clock.

Hon. A. J. DUCHESNAY remarked that on perusing the list of the votes and proceedings of the honourable House, of the previous day, he perceived that his name was altogether omitted on the lists of the members who voted in favour of his hon. friend opposite (Mr. Dessaulles,) disapproving of the appointment of the General Committee of Elections: and the name of an hon. member who was absent he believed, from ill health—appeared on that list. He could account for such a mistake by the hurry of taking down the votes; but he could not account for the total omission of his name on the list of proceedings, when the Clerk could have seen him at his seat during the whole sitting. He would, therefore, ask of the hon. House leave that the Clerk do correct the errors that he complained of, in as efficient a manner, as he could do it.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Hon. Mr. DESSAULLES laid upon the table the report of the Committee on Contingencies—Adopted.

Hon. Mr. DESSAULLES moved for an Address to His Excellency, praying that he will be pleased to issue a warrant in favour of the Clerk of this House, for $40,000, to enable him to meet the contingent expenses of the House—Carried.

THE AMENDED ELECTION COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid his warrant on the table ordering that the following gentlemen should constitute the General Committee on Elections:—Hon. Messrs. Taché, Archambeault, Tessier, Campbell, Harmannus Smith and Ferguson.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS moved against the list of members read by the Clerk as competent to serve on Election Committees, but, after some words of explanation from Mr. Vankoughnet, withdrew the motion.

THE SEAT OF GOVERNMEET.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET rose to reply to a series of questions placed upon the notice-paper by Mr. De Blaquiere. To the first asked, "if it was the intention of the Executive Government to remove the Seat of Government to Quebec in the present year, notwithstanding the decision against such removal taken by the Legislative Council on the 3rd instant, and communicated to His Excellency the Governor General by Address, in reply to His Excellency's Speech on the opening of the present session of Parliament,"—in answer to this, Mr. Vankoughnet said the Government of the day had seen no reason to change the opinion which induced them to recommend his Excellency to place in his Address that paragraph relating to the removal of the Seat of Government from Toronto to Quebec; that while they feel great difficulty had been thrown in their way by the vote of the House, they could not forget that the Address had been carried in the other House by a number of votes, more than double those by which it had been lost in this. Besides which the question of removal was one of prerogative on which the Ministry was competent to advise His Excellency, and neither he (Mr. Vankoughnet) nor his colleagues had seen any reason to depart from the advice previously given He believed the hon. gentleman who spoke against the removal of the Government to Quebec, admitted that the members of the Cabinet were bound, in honour, to redeem the promise they had given, and it seemed to him that the obligation was still binding upon them. The second question demanded; "in what manner the funds necessary for the removal to Quebec, and for the other great expenditure connected therewith, are to be supplied from the Public Treasury; and whether the consent of the Legislative Council to this appropriation will be required previous to any expenditure of the same?" Until the Finance Minister had made his explanations and sent in his estimates to the other branch of the Legislature, he (Mr. Vankoughnet) could not inform his hon. friend in what manner the necessary funds for the purpose would be supplied. As regarded the consent of this Council, it had the same opportunity to deal with money bills now, as it always had. His hon. friend also suggested "if the Executive Government will take the necessary steps for immediately carrying out Her Majesty's decision as to fixing the Seat of Government at Ottawa, by quoting the public buildings there as provided for by the Act of the Legislature?" Her Majesty's Government would, and the Executive Government had already commenced the necessary step for the purpose.

THIRD READINGS.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:—

Married Women's Separate Rights of Property.—(Hon. Mr. Morris.)

To allow verdicts to be returned in civil causes where the jury may not be unanimous—(Hon. Mr. Patton.)

MUNICIPAL DEBENTURES.

Hon. Mr. ALEXANDER moved the second reading of his bill to restrain the issue of municipal debentures beyond a certain amount. The hon. gentleman explained the principle of his Bill to be, that when municipalities had issued debentures to such an extent as would occasion a taxation of two-and-sixpence in the pound, they should not be allowed to extend their liabilities further. This would not prevent the carrying out of improvements, but would in a measure, render those improvements dependent upon the increase in population or wealth of the localities interested.

Hon. Col. PRINCE said a few words in favour of preventing municipalities "running riot," to use a sportsman's phrase, and instanced the county of Essex as likely to be benefitted by such a measure.

The motion was carried and the Bill referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. DeBlaquiere, Patton, Perry, Seymour, and the mover.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

FRIDAY, February 18.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER moved that this House do concur in the report of the committee appointed to report on the Standing Committees of this House.

Hon. Mr. FOLEY moved in amendment that the name of the Hon. Mr. Brown be added to the list of members composing the Committee on Public Accounts. He said the object of his amendment was to remove the gross injustice which the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House feel to have been done to them and to the public service at the omission of the names of certain hon. gentlemen who ought, according to the usual practice, and in consideration of the services performed by them on the public accounts, to have their names placed upon the list. He had not mentioned any hon. members whose names had been omitted besides the hon. member for Toronto, because he thought he would leave it to other hon. gentlemen to bring in amendments to that effect. It would be recollected that during the last session of Parliament a long and laborious investigation of the public accounts was entered upon by the Committee. Among the gentlemen who performed the chief services were his hon. friends on the right and left and the hon. member for Huntingdon. Now, it so happened that the number of members on this side of the House had largely increased since last session, and therefore it appeared strange that the number of members of the Opposition on this committee, should have been apparently intentionally and most improperly, reduced. During the last session of the House we had upon the Public Accounts Committee seven members of the Opposition, and in view of the increase on the Opposition, he thought they might justly claim an increase from seven to ten. Instead of that their number has been reduced to five. (Hear, hear.) The most active, the most efficient, and the most hard-working members of the Committee of this side of the House have been struck off altogether.—There had always been a disposition on the part of this House, as well as on the part of other bodies occupying a similar position, to remedy, irrespective of party feeling, any grievous injustice enacted for the benefit of parties. Without attempting to cast reflections on his own position, he could hardly help referring to the action taken by the House during the last session with regard to the appointment of the Election Committee. As soon as the House observed what appeared to be an injustice, they proceeded at once to rectify the wrong, and the result was that the Committee was composed of an equal number of members from both sides of the House, and, through the operations of that Committee, the contested elections were proceeded with. He supposed it was improper to refer directly to the action of the other branch of the Legislature upon very similar points within a recent period. There, the example set by this House was followed, and, irrespective of party feeling of any kind, that House proceeded at once to remedy the apparent injustice attempted to be done there, by promptly and by a large majority directing that the warrants ordered by the Speaker should be quashed, with the view of selecting a more impartial Committee, representing both sides of the House. This side of the House, he was aware, could not claim that there should be anything like equality. It had not been the practice to have an equality of members from both sides of the House on Committees struck under the control of the Government. But they could claim, as a matter of justice a fair proportion of hon. gentlemen of the Opposition in each Committee, and particularly in the Committee on Public Accounts. Referring to the list, we found seventeen members altogether. Of these seventeen, there were at least eleven decided supporters of the present occupants of the Treasury Benches, and only five of the Opposition. The names of the Hon. Mr. Brown, Messrs. Somerville and Hogan had been omitted, whilst the names of Messrs. Dunkin and Jobin had been added. He trusted that, if the motion he proposed was resisted, there would be a sufficient sense of fair play on the part of the hon. gentlemen supporting the Administration to see that the wrong is not attempted to be inflicted. And for what reason had those names been omitted? Had not those gentlemen been the most faithful and the most energetic in the performance of their public duties during the last session? His hon. friend on his right (Mr. Brown) was well acquainted with all matters relating to public accounts, and so was his hon. friend on his left, (Mr. Hogan) who displayed great energy in all matters that came under his supervision, and extorted from his political opponents even the warmest praise, and the most deserved thanks for his duties. And there was his hon. friend from Huntingdon, (Mr. Somerville) whose business it had ever been to have such matters come under his supervision. Why were these three gentlemen excluded, who exhibited the greatest fidelity, and were most prompt in their attendance and who on that occasion displayed that peculiar talent which fitted them for the discharge of such duties. Why should this be done, but for the purpose of giving the Government that absolute power and control over the officers of that Committee which they ought not to have. He disagreed with some of his hon. friends as to the propriety of striking off the name of the Inspector General. There was no impropriety in this, more particularly as he had but recently attained to office. But he regarded with a great degree of feeling the position of the action of the Government, by which the names of his hon. friends had been omitted on the list. Above all things, he contended that the Committee within whose province it comes to investigate the Public Accounts should be free from all party bias. (Hear, hear.) The members should be selected from the business men of the largest requirements, and disposed to be regular in their attendance, and their appearance upon the Committee should largely tend to subserve the public interest.—Now, no person who observed the fidelity with which his hon. friends performed their duties last session, could fail to be dissatisfied with the action of the Government.—What would the country say? The people would no doubt say that the names of his hon. friends had been omitted for the purpose of preventing that rigid investigation which they commenced last year, but which, through the instrumentality of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, they were unable to complete.—With these remarks, he would conclude, believing that they were sufficient to show that great injustice had been done to his hon. friends.

Atty

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—He resigned. In conclusion he would say that the hon. gentleman could not complain of the statement of the Government as not being explicit enough. If the name of the hon. member for Toronto were added to the committee, the Government would view it as a vote of want of confidence. [Hear, hear.]

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD thought it very unwise on the part of the Government to exclude the hon. members for Toronto and Grey from the Accounts Committee. It appeared as if it was always their policy to exclude from that committee those who were pre-eminently the guardians of the interests of the people. Mr. Mackenzie, after being appointed one year had been left out the year following. In 1857 the committee was composed wholly of the supporters of the Government.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD—Who was it that left out Mr. Mackenzie? It was Mr. Hincks.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—No. It was your own Government. It was found necessary to omit his name. No doubt Mr. Mackenzie had been found exceedingly troublesome. In 1857 the committee took the word of the Government that the Public Accounts were all correct. No one would dare to deny that last year by the exertions of the hon. member for Toronto, who was on that committee, information had been obtained which alarmed the people of the country, and showed that there was something wrong. He contended that the hon. Inspector General had no right to a seat on that committee. If he had, he would have it in his power to explain everything in his own way. But why should anything be concealed from the country, and why should the hon. gentleman be so anxious to use his influence in stifling all enquiry. If he were to be charged with misconduct, and were at the same time a member of the committee, he would be placed in an awkward position. In fact he would be judge in his own cause, which was contrary to every principle of justice, as well as common sense. Mr. Macdonald then read over the names of the gentlemen composing the committee as proposed by the Government and remarked that while twelve had been selected from the supporters of the Ministry, only five had been chosen from the Opposition. That being the case surely the interests of the Inspector General and the Government would be well enough taken care of. If the Government had been desirous of giving the hon. member for Toronto a greater prominence in the country than he already had, they could not have taken more effectual steps than the proposal to exclude him from the Committee in question. The Attorney General West has stated that if the hon. members for Toronto and Grey were put on that committee the Government would resign. It was certainly very manly in the hon. gentleman to say so. But would hon. members who desire a full account of the finances take issue with the Government? Were the people of the country to have no voice in the matter? Hon. gentlemen would find to their cost that the very attempt to stifle inquiry would arouse a spirit in the country which would probe everything to the bottom.—He considered that the five gentlemen who were selected from the Opposition might as well absent themselves from the Committee as attend it. (Hear, bear.) No greater benefit could have been conferred on the country than that which last year accrued from the labours of the two hon. gentlemen whom the Government now attempted to exclude. Was the most important Committee to be wholly in the hands of the Ministry? He regretted the Government had taken such a stand. At the same time he was very glad they had put it on the narrower footing of a vote of want of confidence.

Hon. Mr. GALT said that in opposing the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo, he could scarcely be supposed to do so, from the position in which he stood, as being personally connected with the Public Accounts. He desired to say that he recognized most fully the duty of discharging whatever public obligations might devolve upon him; but whilst he was prepared to place himself voluntarily in a position which would involve in many different ways, the loss of his self-respect, he felt bound to say that the opportunities he had as a member of that Committee during last session of watching its proceedings were such as to create in his breast very painful feelings.—The course of examination adopted by the hon. member for Toronto was not such as in his (Mr. Galt's) judgment was calculated to elicit information. They resolved themselves into accusations, and if the investigations before a committee were to be carried on in that way, there would be an end of all useful legislation, both by the House and by the Committees. For his own part he felt it to be a duty to give to the House the fullest information with regard to the financial affairs of the Province; but he conceived it was no part of his duty to be subjected to questions such as no one would venture to put to him except under the sanction of a Committee of the House.—(Ironical cries of "Hear, hear." He had no objection as the Finance Minister of this country, to meet any charge which might be made against him on the floor of the House, because then he would be in a position to give an answer; but if the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo were carried he (Mr. Galt certainly would not consider it consistent with his ideas of self-respect to place himself in the power of Public Accounts Committee. (Renewed cries of "Hear! hear!") He was prepared to go still further and to say that he believed a committee such as the Committee of Public Accounts, was destructive and subversive of the principles of Responsible Government. (Oh! oh!) He repeated that a committee conducted in the way in which the Public Accounts Committee was last year conducted, was subversive of the principles of Responsible Government. (Hear! hear!) He said so deliberately; because everything connected with the whole legislation of the country was discussed before that committee. It was ably and ingeniously done by the hon. member for Toronto, essentially from a party point of view, and who made use of the information thus obtained for party purposes. It was done in the most unscrupulous manner, and it was done for the express purpose of damaging the Inspector General [Mr. Cayley.] The Government were not responsible to the Public Accounts Committee, but to the House; and he conceived that it was impossible for the Government to omit if investigations were prosecuted before a committee in the same spirit which actuated some of the members of the Public Accounts Committee towards the close of last session.—He did not desire to occupy the time of the House in discussing a matter which might be regarded as personal to himself. At the same time he wished it to be understood that he would not consent to hold the office of Inspector General for a day if the constitution of it should be altered by the Government excluding the hon. minister Toronto, was not adopted; for he would never permit the hon. member for Toronto to pursue the same course towards him as he pursued last session towards the hon. member for Renfrew. [Ironical cries of "Hear, hear."]

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS was astonished, and was certain that the country would be astonished, at the declarations of the Government upon this occasion. (Hear, hear.) He knew nothing of what had taken place before the Committee of Public Accounts, and from what he knew of the hon. member for Renfrew, he was certain that if any charges of want of integrity or honour had been brought against him, these accusations must be unfounded; but that Responsible Government should be endangered by the organization of a Committee like this, appeared to him to be one of the most astounding declarations ever made by a Government. (Hear, hear.) It was doubly astounding when it came from a gentleman who had been one of the first to insist upon such a Committee, and when that Committee was composed of twelve Ministerialists against five members of the Opposition—a majority in favour of the Government such as he would venture to say was never before heard of on a Committee of this kind.—Surely, the hon. gentleman had formed strange notions of Responsible Government! He said, that the manner in which the investigations had been conducted was subversive of Responsible Government, as if the majority of the Committee was not responsible for the manner in which the investigation should be conducted. (Hear, hear.) The Premier got up and said, "Now I have my majority at my back, I dare you to put the member for Toronto on the Committee!" This was a threat which would resound from one end of the country to the other, and produce its due effect upon the public mind. (Hear, hear.) The Premier, too, when addressing the House in French characterized the conduct of the member for Toronto last session as being scandalous.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—And so it was.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Could it be possible that a man who had conducted himself in such a scandalous manner should have been sent for by his Excellency, and entrusted with the task of forming an Administration? (Hear, hear, and laughter.)—If the hon. member for Toronto, when on the Committee, had put improper questions, it was competent for the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Galt) to have declared them to be such.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—All the questions were put through the Chairman himself.—(Hear, hear.)

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The Premier had complained of the reports of that Committee having been published in the Globe without the authority of the Committee.—He (Mr. Drummond) never heard of but one such instance, and in that case the report was published by the Chairman himself—it being in all probability intended to pave the way to the position which that hon. gentleman now occupied, and, for that purpose, to oust the former incumbent. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Drummond) implored the House, for the sake of the credit of the country, not to reject the names of those who devoted so much of their time and attention last session to investigations in the Public Accounts. It was of the utmost importance that they should be on the Committee. If they were not on, it would be said throughout the country, in England, and wherever anything was known of the public finances, that there was something in the Accounts of the Province respecting which the Ministry dared not permit an enquiry. (Hear, hear.) He did not say that there were any secrets, but the hon. gentlemen on the other side were taking the very best course they possibly could take to make it appear to the public, that there were secrets which they would not suffer to be divulged.—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. NOTMAN had not addressed the House upon any one of the important subjects which had been brought before it since the commencement of the session; but he could no longer remain silent when an act of gross tyranny and oppression such as this was attempted to be forced upon the House. The premier had called upon his followers to commit a great wrong; and if they rejected the amendment of the hon. member for Waterloo, he [Mr. Notman] would advise them to go a step further and expel not only the hon member for Toronto from the committees and the House, but, if they found them so very troublesome, the whole of the Opposition also. Where could be found the man to whom the country was under greater obligations for the ability and attention which he had devoted to the finances of the country than to the hon. member for Toronto? [Hear, hear.] The Province was more indebted to him for his efforts in this direction than for all the liberal measures he had brought into the House valuable as these were. And why was he excluded? Surely he could not be all-powerful on a committee on which there were twelve Ministerialists. The attempt was one of the worst that could be conceived for gagging the members of the Legislature, and would raise a storm of indignation, throughout the country which the Ministry would not be able to allay. In justice to the Opposition and to the country, the hon. gentleman ought not to be excluded, and he hoped the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo would be sustained—even if it should be at the loss of the Administration. [Cheers.]

The amendment was lost on the following division:—

ARMSTRONG'S LONG RANGE GUN.—A trial of this gun has been made upon the floating battery Trusty; the effect of the firing was so severe as to start, in every direction, the plates in the parts fired at.—Some further account of the performance of the gun have come to hand, from which it appears that Mr. Armstrong, in one of his experiments, loaded and fired his own gun one hundred times in 130 minutes, and every time he fired he struck a target nine feet square, placed at a distance from him 1,300 yards. He deems it quite possible to sink a ship of war, however powerful at a distance of three miles from the gun, and his piece of ordnance has already propelled a shot over five miles of ground. It is possible indeed, with this gun, to hit objects out of common sight range, and a distance once calculated by daylight, or object five miles away, can be struck with unerring and mathematical precision during the darkest night. To obtain the range by daylight is the only necessity; a thing which can be done however, with as great certainty as the gun can be fired; and this object once arrived at, the firing of the gun, and the destruction of the object, becomes a matter of arithmetical calculation. One proof of the gun's accuracy of range seems to be a test such as was never before applied to a piece of ordnance. The side of the Trusty was divided into separate targets, each one of which was consecutively hit by the artilleryman, according as he was directed to change his aim. Its destructive effect needs no other comment than that given above, although its facility in firing shell alone places it above any other gun manufactured. The shell of Armstrong's fired by his "long range" gun, does not explode immediately on concussion, but strikes its object, passing through it where it is possible, and then explodes. On firing at a target, for instance, behind which was exposed another at a distance of some yards, the shell passed through the first, and exploding on reaching the second one, completely shattered it to pieces. Against a ship of war the result obtained by this shell would be most tremendous. Entering the bows or stern, it would likely travel midships, and, exploding there, would rip the vessel to pieces.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Parliamentary.

The great event of the week, at Toronto, has been the deliberate rejection of Mr. Brown's name from the list of persons, to compose the Committee on Public Accounts. Mr. Cartier made it a test question of the popularity of the Ministry in the House; and insisted that, if Members decided to allow Mr. Brown's name to be added, there would be no course open but to resign. A vote was taken, and by a small majority Mr. Brown was rejected.—If the Accounts are all right, Mr. Brown could not make them wrong, neither could he damage the Ministry by exposure.—If they are not right, however, it may have been necessary to exclude him, to preserve secrecy, but the country will look with great suspicion upon the movement.—No matter about Mr. Brown's inquisitiveness. Let it be ever so searching and disagreeable to the heads of departments; he was still sent there to assist in keeping things in order, and, as the recognized chief of the Opposition, he ought to have been especially welcome. Mr. Cartier and his supporters will yet bitterly regret this false step.

Heeling.

Our friends of the Free Presbyterian Church, held a social meeting of the Congregation on Wednesday, the 16th inst., in their newly erected Church—the basement of which is now fitted up for Church service, until the upper part is finished. The meeting was numerously attended, and the ladies of the Congregation had everything desirable provided for the "inner man," in the form of all the etcetras which are the requisites at a tea party. The main object of the meeting was, we understand, for the purpose of bringing the numerous adherents of the Free Presbyterian Church on a more social footing with each other, which we have no doubt was a success in this instance. The Rev'd Pastor of the Congregation presided over the meeting.—Addresses were delivered by several gentlemen of the Congregation, showing the financial condition of their affairs, and how matters have been conducted by the Building Committee in erecting their new Church. Messrs. Wm. Hall, James Harvey, D. Sutherland, Wm. Johnston, A. Fowlis, G. Couper, and the Rev. Wm. Blain spoke at considerable length. Capt. Sutherland, we understand, was particularly pointed in returning thanks to the ladies of the congregation for the energy they had displayed in raising funds through the means of their Bazaar to aid in constructing the new Church.

Such meetings as these are worthy of imitation amongst a Christian community of Church-going people, as they serve to promote harmony, good feeling, and unity, in the adherents of the Church that adopt the method of uniting together in a social, as well as in a religious point of view.

The Town Printing.

On 31st January a motion was made in the Town Council, by Mr. Read, seconded by Mr. Toole,

"That the Printing for this Council be let by tender for the current year, in the same manner as for the County Council, and that the Mayor be instructed to advertise for tenders in accordance with the foregoing.—Lost.

Why was this motion lost? The printing accounts of the Town run well up to £100 a year, and every one will understand that if the work were given by contract, it could be got done cheaper than now. But it would not suit jobbing Councillors, to let this patronage out of their hands. They are afraid of the press, so they seek the means of conciliating it, by sops. If the printing were done by contract, the power of the Mayor and Councillors to enforce silence or to chain a whiteworking, would be gone. They would then have to pay out of their own pockets, to those who would receive it; a very different thing from paying it out of the pockets of other people. The Council ought to lend no support of this kind; if they act right, they may defy the press; if wrong, they ought not to be let buy immunity with the people's money. It is remarkable that there is this year no printing committee on the list, but that the Finance Committee performs its functions. Mr. Thomas White in on the Committee; in the Report of their proceedings will be seen how satisfied he is that his own bill is correct; but his neighbour must submit to further examination. Does it occur to Mr. White that the law has provided against the contingency of a Councillor voting money into his own pocket, by requiring him to deny on his oath that he has any dealing with the corporation;

Where was his conscience when he took that oath? For our part, we tell the Council plainly that if they choose to harrass the creditors of the Town, there is a course open to enforce payment with costs, and if an order for payment is not made at there next meeting, legal proceedings will be taken to compel payment. Last year, the printing bill of this office due in January, was not paid until November, and there was no grumbling on our part. This year they may rely upon it, we are not going to dance attendance on their mightinesses.—And if we do printing for the town, we want it in a straightforward open manner, in competition with others, not by trying which can belord the Mayor the most.

Railroad Still Closed.

Great disappointment is felt from the discontinuance of the train on the Port Hope and Peterboro road. The rolling stock is under seizure, and the company does not seem able to loosen the hold of the Sheriff. The embarrassment although but temporary, is very destructive of the credit of the concern, and damaging to the interests of the Towns because parties making advances for the lumber and other produce of the upper country will be inclined to dwell upon the circumstance as a possible cause of failure in their customers in getting in time to market. If, as is represented the pressing liabilities are but light, it would surely be within the power of the directors, by some means, to set them aside, and certainly it is of the utmost importance, that an effort should be made. If however they expect Peterboro' to lend a hand, as being one of the sufferers there will be a miscalculation. Cobourg is still within call and if there is a spark of life left in her, now is the time for her to make advances. As the old lady "facetiously expressed herself," "We have two roads, and we have one road"—Sheridan.

The Conger Suit.

The Review declares Mr. Conger to have been straightforward and consistent throughout the debenture transaction, and with the greatest coolness instances his letter to the ratepayers of Peterborough. He does not republish that letter, however. Consistent! Well if it is consistence to say, in a letter that he was dealing with the agent of the Township of Wolford; and, in Chancery, that he never understood Mr. Whitmarsh to represent himself as acting for any municipality; and again in his letter to the Council, that he was acting for the Government as back interest; and in chancery, that he considered the money to be owing to Mr. Whitmarsh individually, to whom he says he paid it to his own use and benefit. There is consistence in Mr. Conger's conduct throughout, but it is such consistence as none but a hardened deceiver would practice. Confute this, if you dare, Review, by republishing Mr. Conger's letter.

Town Council.

MONDAY, Feb. 21, 1859.

A communication from Mr. Dennistoun, claiming the sum of $100, for Mr. James Harvey, as compensation for injury to his lot, on the corner of Hunter and Water streets, by water, was read and referred.

A communication from Mr. Jas. Hamilton complaining of the Railroad on Bethune street as a nuisance, and demanding compensation therefor from the Corporation was read and referred.

A communication from the Receiver General's office, demanding immediate payment of the arrears of interest on account of the Municipal Loan Fund account was read and referred.

Mr. Conger laid upon the table a petition, signed by 233 inhabitants of the town, asking that the Council may take steps to suppress the evils resulting from the unrestricted sale of spirituous liquors.

The Auditors' report was read by the Mayor, and with the abstract of receipts, expenditures and liabilities, laid upon the table.

The following report from the Committee on Finance and Assessment was read, received and adopted:

Your Committee have had under their consideration accounts from

Ormond and Gilmour, sundries,..	$ 5 40
T. & R. White, printing and stationery,.....	141 45
Sawers & Murray, stationery,...	7 99

which they have examined, found correct, and now recommend should be paid out of the first moneys applicable for that purpose.

The account of Mr. Sawers, for printing, your Committee cannot undertake to audit until it is furnished in detail, showing number of lines, insertions, &c.

The account of Robert Henderson for two days attendance in the Town Hall during the East ward election has not been allowed, as your Committee find no authority for the charge.

Your Committee have examined the claim of 13s. 8d., being overcharge on taxes on town lot No. 13, south of Sherbrooke street, and find that the taxes were first paid to the Sheriff, with costs, and afterwards to the Collector, Mr. Cumming. Your Committee therefore recommend that Mr. Cumming should return the amount to Mr. Bradshaw.

Your Committee have also had the Memorial of E. Carry & Co. before them, asking to have a portion of the sum paid for shop-licenses during the past year refunded, on the ground that they only enjoyed the benefit of said license for a portion of the year.

Your Committe find, upon enquiry, that it has been the practice heretofore to charge full price through whether for the whole of the current year or not; but, although they are not prepared at this moment to say that they approve of the practice, just as the transaction occurred before their advent to office they do not think it proper to interfere.

The attention of your Committee has also been directed to the Account of A. Fowlis and Co., in which these gentlemen claim to be paid the sum of £25, deducted from them, contrary to agreement, on the sale of two Debentures.

Upon examination, your Committee find a resolution passed on the 18th October last that Messrs. Fowlis & Co. were to have these Debentures, or their proceeds, in payment of their Account, at 25 per cent discount, claiming a difference of the amount claimed. Your Committee are of opinion, that Messrs. Fowlis & Co. are, looking at the matter, as recorded in the books of the Council, clearly entitled to the sum claimed.

Your Committee cannot, however, but express their regret, that their predecessors, the Finance Committee of 1858, should have found it necessary to leave them so considerable a legacy as the settlement of accounts contracted by them during their term of office, and which should have been disposed of before the close of the year.

(Signed) W. S. Conger. A. Fowlis!!! W. B. Read. Thomas White, jun.!!! (The names, with notes of exclamation, passed their own Accounts! Did they scratch backs?)

Committee-room, Feb. 21, 1859.

A Report from the Special Committee appointed to define the duties of Officers, and fix the salaries of Officers for the current year, was by the Chairman, handed in, received, and adopted.

The Report recommended, as License Inspectors, Thomas Beavis and John Haggart, with salaries of £15 each.

Assessors: Thomas J. Heathorn and Robert Rowe, salary £15 each.

High Constable, Wm. Cumming, salary £60, and the free use of the house on the market square.

Town Clerk and Treasurer, James Edwards. Salary £100.

The Committee also recommend that the Mayor should act as Police Magistrate.—Salary £25.

C. A. Weller, Esq, was appointed Solicitor to the Town.

Mr. Conger moved, seconded by Mr. Morrow,—That a By-law to make further provision for the Inns and other places of public entertainment be now read a first time.—Carried.

Mr. White moved, seconded by Mr. Read,—That a memorial to Parliament, praying the enactment of a Prohibitory Liquor Law be read a first time.—Memorial read, and again, passed, and ordered for presentation to the Legislature.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Fowlis,—That a cheque do issue for the sum of of Seventy-five Pounds to enable the Mayor to pay costs incurred in the Chancery suit now pending, and that it be referred to the Finance Committee.—Carried.

Council adjourned till Friday, at 7 p. m.

Arrival of the "Prince Albert."

ST. JOHNS, N. F., Feb. 18.

The steamship Prince Albert, Captain Waters, from Galway on the evening of the 5th inst., has arrived here.

The advices by this arrival are from London and Liverpool to the evening of the 4th by mail, and to the 5th by telegraph, and are one week later.

The steamship North American, from Portland, arrived at Liverpool on the 3rd.

Breadstuffs were quiet but firm.

Provisions also firm.

Money market slightly easier. Consols for money were quoted at 94¼, and for account 95.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Queen opened Parliament in person on February 3rd.

The speech commences with congratulations on the state of the country and on the progress made in India. On foreign affairs it says, "I receive from all foreign powers assurances of friendly feelings. To cultivate and confirm these feelings, to maintain inviolate the faith of our public treaties, and contribute so far as my influence can extend to the objects of general peace, are the objects of my unceasing solicitude.—The conclusion of the treaties in regard to the Principalities, and one of commerce with Russia are noticed, and the latter is referred to as an indication of the complete establishment of friendship between the two countries. The treaties with China and Japan are mentioned as promising great commercial advantages, and great satisfaction is expressed at the abolition by France of negro emigration on the coast of Africa, and that the pending negotiations give promise of a total abandonment of the system. In respect to Mexico, the speech says:—"The state of the Republic of Mexico, distracted by civil wars, has induced me to carry my forbearance to the utmost extent in regard to wrongs and indignities to which British subjects have been subjected at the hands of the two contending parties. They have at length been carried to such an extent that I have been compelled to give instructions to the Commander of the Naval forces in those seas, to demand, and if necessary to enforce, reparation." Increased expenditure on the navy is asked on account of the universal introduction of steam power into naval warfare. The rest of the speech is devoted to local matters, and amongst the measures proposed are Parliamentary reform and a new Bankruptcy Law.

Addresses in response to the speech were agreed to in both Houses.

Earl Melville in the House of Lords and Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons complained of the silence in regard to the threatening state of the Italian question and other matters of interest. Lord Derby and Mr. D'Israeli expressed their confidence in the maintenance of peace.

Warlike rumors were still in circulation, but nothing decisive was known.

FRANCE.

France continues her warlike preparations.

It was rumoured that the Duke of Malakoff would soon return to Paris, and be succeeded in London by the Duke de Montebello.

Prince Napoleon and his bride had arrived in Paris.

The Bourse fluctuated considerably and declined nearly one per cent after the Queen's Speech.

Great anxiety was felt in regard to the Emperor's speech at the opening of the Legislature, on the 7th. It was rumoured that he is preparing a surprise for the world, and that war is certain.

The Minister of the Colonies had decided that the emigration of Africans should be superseded by Chinese.

There were rumours prevailing of extensive warlike preparations, including 3,000 men for the navy.

The marriage of Prince Napoleon and the King of Sardinia's daughter was celebrated at Turin on the 20th, and the bridal party started forthwith for Paris.

Turin letters say that matters looked slightly more pacific there.

The Austrian six millions loan had been introduced in London. It bore 5 per cent interest. It was quoted at a discount for some time, but suddenly improved, and closed at a small premium.

SARDINIA.

The Sardinian Government had decided upon a loan

It was reported that the King of Sardinia was about to marry the sister of the Empress of Russia, widow of the late Duke of Leuchtenberg.

The Brazilian mails had arrived at Lisbon, bringing news that the Brazilian Government had offered its mediation with Paraguay; and that the American commander had accepted the offer, and that a Brazilian Admiral had gone to Paraguay on the mission.

The Melbourne mails of the 18th of December had reached England, and gold valued at £568,000 was on its way there.

The steamship City of Manchester left Liverpool for New York on the 2nd inst.

Political disquietude is decreasing.

The Bombay mail of January 11th has been telegraphed. Various British successes are reported, including the defeat of Tantia Topee's forces.

PARIS, Friday evening.

Bourse much depressed—3 per cent's have declined to 66¼.

The Prince Albert had a boisterous passage, and is slightly damaged. She has nearly a full compliment of passengers, among them Wm. Smith O'Brien of Ireland.

John Oliver is returned to Parliament for Galway.

The Imperial and Royal Marriage.

We stated in our last that Prince Napoleon had left Paris on his way to Turin. The prince arrived there at three p. m. on Sunday; he was received at the terminus by Prince Carignan. The concourse assembled to await his arrival greeted him with shouts of "Viva Napoleone," "Viva il Re," "Viva Francia," and "Viva Italia." The prince drove direct to the royal palace, and was received at the foot of the grand staircase by the king and his ministers. In the evening a grand representation took place in the Theatre Royal in honor of his Imperial Highness.

The first interview between Prince Napoleon and the Princes Clotilda took place on Monday afternoon. In the evening the prince was present at a ball given by the President of the Council at the palace of the Ministry.

A correspondent at Turin gives us the following:—The great and special topic of the day is the proposed marriage of Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilda, eldest daughter of the King Victor Emanuel.—This event is certain and imminent. The first proposals of marriage came last year from the Tuileries, but were not received altogether with favour; and this year the gravity of circumstances, a seriousness that is at the present extreme, has cleared away every intervening obstacle. The sole condition imposed by King Victor Emanuel has been, that the future bridegroom and bride should first see and become acquainted with each other. Hence the coming of the Prince. The betrothed Princess is only sixteen years of age, not remarkably beautiful, but graceful and animated. The Prince is thirty-seven years of age, and his expectations of ever becoming heir to the throne are remote. Under these circumstances it is natural that people should talk of a kingdom, to be procured by war, for a scion of the Napoleonic house. Where? you will ask. On former occasions I have commenced my [illegible] with confidence of absolute knowledge. This time I will merely present to you the political picture, in which discerning people here believe they behold the proximate future of Italy.

THE HOUSE OF SAVOY.

The approaching marriage of Prince Napoleon with a Princess of Sardinia has naturally combined with the critical aspect of Italian politics to render the House of Savoy an object of extraordinary interest in the eyes of Europe. In the popular cries of Lombardy the King of Sardinia is saluted as the future King of Italy, and the peace of the Continent for the next generation appears now to depend on the policy of Piedmont. To satisfy the curiosity which such circumstances are calculated to excite we subjoin a sketch of the events by the course of which a petty principality, originally neither royal by rank nor Italian by connexion, has been brought into a position investing it with at least the credit of such remarkable destinies.

Europe contains no more ancient or long-descended family than that represented by King Victor Emanuel, who but a year or two ago was welcomed by the hospitalities of this metropolis, after the conclusion of the Crimean war. Even the Capets of France cannot compete in antiquity of extraction with the Princes of Savoy.—When the first of these princes became conspicuous enough for historical record, Canute the Dane was ruling in England, and Edward the confessor was a child; but, though that period is upwards of 800 years ago, it by no means coincides with the origin of the Sardinian family. The house, in its own sphere and fashion, is believed to have been invested with the attributes of chieftainship long before, and it is only when its fortunes had already become established that we obtain the first glimpse of its dignities. Its territorial position was extremely curious. In the ancient distribution of Europe a strip of country was left between the massive kingdoms of France on the one hand and Germany on the other, which could hardly be called independent, and which was yet without any definite allegiance. In the north its principal feature was the Duchy of Lorraine; in the South a state, which was sometimes called the kingdom of Burgundy, and afterwards the Kingdom of Arles. This kingdom of Arles included among the constituent provinces the States of Burgundy, Dauphiny, Provence and Savoy, and it would be hard to say to what superior government they really belonged. In theory, notwithstanding the prevalence of the French race and language, they probably pertained to the Germanic empire, and it was certainly in that empire that the kingdom of Arles, at its extinction, was presumed to merge. France, however, in the end acquired Dauphiny, Burgundy, and Provence, as, indeed, in a more recent generation, she acquired also Lorraine; but the Principality of Savoy did not fall to the same lot. By good fortune it escaped absorption altogether, maintained its own ground, and, in the early part of the 11th century produced as we have said, its first recognized prince, who already represented a long line of ancestors.

The first title assumed by the House was that of Maurienne, which was exchanged about a hundred years later, for that of Savoy, and we may probably trace in this alteration of style an assumed submission of authority from a special district to the whole of the province. Here, then, just after the King William Rufus had been shot in the New forest was planted the House of Savoy; territorially on the French side of the Alps; politically in relation to the contested dependence of the Empire

Crown. With Italy it had no connection save that of opportunity or temptation; but as there was nothing to be made out of France, and the family from its establishment was always making something somewhere, the Counts of Savoy cast their eyes towards that fertile plain at the foot of their hills to which its situation had given the name of Piedmont. When the kingdom of Lombardy had been broken up into Ducal States, Piedmont, intervening between the region of the Milanese and the eastern frontier of Savoy, was occupied, in great part, by the Marquisate of Montferrat, and with this Government the Counts of Savoy struggled for ascendancy. They very early gained ground. Before the 12th century had concluded the Counts of Savoy were lords also of Aosta, of other minor baronies, and, as regards titular distinction, of Piedmont itself, though they were certainly not then in possession of the whole territory. In the next century one of the prosperous and thriving family crossed over to England to become Archbishop of Canterbury, and a visit which his brother the reigning Count paid him leaves some traces even to the present day of the remains of the Savoy Palace in the Strand. As time wore on, and the acquisitions of the House still continued, it was currently said in the medieval proverbs, that Europe contained only one King, one Duke, and one Count—the King of France, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Count of Savoy, no other specimen of any of these orders being comparable with models so excellent. The House of Savoy, however, soon exchanged this designation for a higher one. In the 15th century they were made, by the fiat of the Germanic Emperor, dukes instead of counts, and dukes they remained till three hundred years later they were transformed into kings.

All this while, as will have been observed, the territorial nucleus of the House stood on what may be called "No Man's Land." It was not that the county of Savoy pretended to absolute rights of sovereignty—such rights were never advanced in those days—but the Savoy County was certainly not French, certainly not Italian, and only German by vague and indefinite allegiance. A curious illustration of its compound nationality was given in later times by one of its most famous heroes—the Prince Eugene of Marlborough's wars, who used to sign his name in three languages—"Eugenio von Savoys." Still, the chief efforts of the family were always made on the side of Italy, and ultimately with success. Two critical periods of European history—not unlike each other in their general features—contributed to bring the House of Savoy into the position which it now fills. The first of these is characterised by the campaigns of Louis XIV., the second by those of Napoleon I. At the beginning of the eighteenth century the European Powers were allied in arms to prevent the acquisition by the French Monarch of the great patrimony of Spain—a patrimony which included large provinces of Italy. Victor Amadeus, then Duke of Savoy, sided with the allies, and was rewarded at the close of the struggle, not only with the Montferrat portion of Piedmont, but with the Kingdom of Sicily, which for a year or two he actually retained. It was afterwards found convenient to resume this portion of the allotment, and then Sardinia was given to Savoy in Sicily's place, the Royal title going with it, as before. A century later came another desperate struggle between Europe and France, and then Sardinia was reimbursed with the ancient territories and magnificent city of Genoa,—the Janua, or gate, as the name implies, through which the Gauls or French found their way into Italy.

Such is the history of this remarkable family [illegible] of the creations of the last war, ranks youngest among the Royal Houses of Europe and yet in antiquity of princely pedigree is a match for any. The Counts of Savoy were dignified and distinguished princes before either the Hapsburgs or the Hohenzollerns attained any prominence at all. They are now kings; and, though their state is far from being of the first class, and is constructed of strange materials—though the cradle of their race lies in one country, dominions in another, and the title in a third, they are still conceived to enjoy extraordinary prospects, and are undoubtedly regarded with uncommon interest and favor. Something no doubt, of all this fortune they owe to the very anomaly of their situation. It was once said of a Duke of Savoy by a famous diplomatist, that his geographical position prevented his being an honest man, and the hereditary acquisitiveness of the house has been now and then exercised, it is true, with some sharpness of practice.—One prince, though he left nine children, got himself declared Pope; another secured after the breakup of the Crusading expeditions, the titular sovereignties of Cyprus and Jerusalem; a third, the Victor Amadeus of whom we have previously spoken, not only fought hard for Spain and the Indies, but lodged with the House of Commons, after the expulsion of the Stuarts, a distinct request for the Kingdom of Great Britain, founded on his marriage with a descendant of Charles I. Yet, until the awards made by the treaties of Vienna, no extension of dominion seems to have ever given the House of Savoy any discontented subjects, and, though the cession of Genoa provoked great jealousies and some remonstrance, still the House of Savoy represented, at any rate an Italian, and not a foreign Government. Such, at least, it had come to be considered, for the court had long deserted Maurienne and Chambery for the more purely Italian atmosphere of Turin, and the original French province of Savoy was almost invisible behind the broad territories of Piedmont. Since that time more substantial sympathies have been excited by the constitutional progress of the State, and Sardinia not only represents a vigorous Italian power, but a free Italian community. Its position is strange. It is almost as if some small Welsh Prince had been left undisturbed by the Plantagenets in the recesses of Carnarvonshire or Cumberland, and his representatives had found themselves a thousand years afterwards with pretensions to the Empire of Britain. Yet it is especially remarkable that those prospects, marvellous as they are, may, if they are reasonably interpreted and peaceably pursued, prove really to have some foundation. Sardinia will not command the sympathy of Europe in violating treaties on pretexts of patriotism or nationality, but if she continues steadily in the career of political civilization and freedom the natural course of events can hardly fail to insure her progress in influence and power.

Arrival of the "Kangaroo."

NEW YORK, Feb. 22.

The Africa arrived at her dock about nine o'clock this morning. She left Liverpool on Feb. 5th.

Her advices have been anticipated by the Prince Albert at St. John's.

She brings 50 passengers, among them Baron Vogelsang, the Russian Minister.

LATEST BY TELEGRAPH.

London, 5th.—Funds opened yesterday at 4 decline, and closed 4 lower than Thursday. Quotations of [illegible] all other descriptions show a decline. There was also a great fall in French funds yesterday, equal to ¾, making a decline of 1¼ since the two days, and fully 2¼ since New Year.

The Daily News argues from the remarks of the Premier and Chancellor of the Exchequer that the position of foreign affairs is most critical. The Ministers are unable to furnish authoritative information respecting the intentions of the French Emperor. It is felt more clearly than ever that the preservation of peace depends upon the will of one individual. The Times' article says the complications in that war is intangled to be prevented. The discussion in Parliament has had a very discouraging effect, which was greatly aggravated by the plot in Italy. All the other city journals are also speculating on the war question—announcement of the attempt of Sardinia to make a loan, and the Imperial pantion. The Times says in its leading editorial:—"The torch of war but once lighted, no one can tell when it can be quenched. To England there seems but one duty—that of urging energetically that without war or any other disturbance of the general peace of Europe, Italy shall be free." In another part of the city article of the Times it is presumed that the Sardinian loan is intended to be raised at Turin, but if that be impracticable then at Paris under French guarantees. In London it would scarcely be entertained for a moment. The fall in 5 per cents since the first of January has already been equal nearly to 10 per cent.

Advices by telegraph state that fighting has commenced in Montenegro. The Russians had been repulsed in the attempt to take the town of Gheliepik on the Circassian coast.

A Hint to the Ladies.

A Paris correspondent sends us the following alarming statement:—

Notwithstanding the announcement of various brilliant marriages in the upper class of Paris life, the vestibule of the lenten season being the usual temple of Hymen at this period of the year, it is marked by those who make social questions a study, that the few sections of this metropolis (which in all are about a dozen), inhabited by the well-to-do families, do not contribute to the list of unions chronicled at the respective mayoralty registers, in anything like the proportion which occurs in the quarters tenanted by the industry and commerce of the town. The habits of display and the lavish expenditure required by ladies in their notions of what is requisite for an 'establishment,' have become so colossal, that bridegrooms have been alarmed and have become scarce. To discourage extravagance ought, in self-defence, to be the task of the gentler sex; but it is feared that the fatal consequences are of their own fostering, of course unawares.

The very weapons employed by ladies to ensnare the rougher sex are turned against themselves. While the fashions of an extravagant court are copied in all ranks of society, men are afraid to undertake the responsibility incident to wedded bliss.—Crinoline is the great enemy of matrimony. Prudent men, in looking to the expense of modern skirts, are impelled to calculate the cost of dressing a wife so that she shall be "fit to be seen." In sober seriousness, excessive expenditure is the great vice of our day. The frauds and the failures of the last year or two, from Robson and Redpath to Waugh, had their origin in the prevalent mania for show. The fair sex are chargeable with encouraging this foolish and dangerous passion, and the effects are resolving on themselves. They need to reflect that everything false is in bad taste, and that there is no weakness more fatal to comfort and real respectability than that of "keeping up appearances." The evil began with the ladies, and with them must begin the reform. When they discover that it so nearly touches their own interests there may be some ground for hope.—Times.

The Prince of Wales and Canada.

In January last, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales commenced his military career by presenting colours to the 100th (the Prince of Wales' Royal Canadian) Regiment of Foot, at Stoneykill Camp. The Prince was accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and a distinguished staff. After the regiment had been duly paraded, and the usual formalities had been gone through, the Royal Highness, on presenting the colours said:—

"Lord Melville, Colonel de Rottenburg, and Officers and Soldiers of the 100th Regiment.—It is most gratifying to me that, by the Queen's gracious permission, my first public act since I have had the honour of holding an appointment in the British army should be the presentation of colours to a regiment which is composed of the sons of those brave men who, in the year 1812, fought so gallantly for the defence of the province, and by their valour and devotion to their country, materially contributed to the successful issue of the contest in which they were engaged. The words which I have addressed to you, and the ceremony which we have just gone through, bear a peculiar significance and solemnity, because in confiding to you for the first time this emblem of military fidelity and valour, I not only recognize emphatically your enrolment into our national force, but celebrate an act which proclaims and strengthens the unity of the various parts of this vast empire under the sway of our common Sovereign. Although, owing to my youth and inexperience, I can but very imperfectly give expression to the sentiments which this occasion is calculated to awaken with reference to yourselves and to the great and flourishing province of Canada, you may rest assured that I shall ever watch the progress and achievements of your gallant corps with deep interest, and that I heartily wish you all honour and success in the prosecution of the noble career on which you have entered."

After the ceremony the Prince of Wales left for Dover, where he arrived the same evening at half-past five o'clock, to embark for Ostend on his visit to Rome. The Morning Post in commenting upon this speech, says, "These words were addressed to men the representatives of that brave and devoted race who 1812, almost single handed, beat back the invading armies of the United States, and who have since organized a system of domestic defence, which enables England safely to entrust the protection of Canada to the people of the province," and the writer concludes by expressing a well-founded conviction, that the people of this country will respond to the few appropriate words which the Prince of Wales addressed to Canada, and join with his Royal Highness in wishing for the 100th regiment "all honour and success in the prosecution of the noble career on which they have entered."

The Canadian Leaders.

(From the Scottish American Journal.)

In our frequent references to the politics of the British Provinces, Canada more especially, we have it in view to interest our readers in the States as well as our Colonial friends. Our principle in selecting subjects is to take up only such as have an interest beyond the locality. In point of fact we find that we have scarcely ever chosen a subject of remark which has not been discussed simultaneously or subsequently by the British press, with whose sentiments we have been glad to notice our own have been in accordance. By way of further interesting our readers in the states on these subjects, so far as Canada is concerned, we shall now introduce them briefly to the two leading politicians of the Province, who as fellow countrymen may be supposed to appeal somewhat specially to those clanish feelings which our English friends, not without considerable truth in point of fact, lay to the charge of us Scotchmen, though the charge, as we have elsewhere remarked, is one that should not carry with it any blame from that quarter.

Mr. John A. Macdonald and Mr. Geo. Brown, the two men who are by far the most active and influential among their contemporaries in Canadian politics, have as little in common as it is possible to conceive in two natives of the same country. The wide difference between Edinburgh and Glasgow has often been remarked.—Though these cities are only forty miles apart there is a greater difference than between Glasgow and New York; and in like manner between Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Brown, both Scotchmen, the one a native of Glasgow and the other a native of Edinburgh, there is as little difference between two men of distinct and dissimilar races. Yet they both bear evident enough traces of the national character, though in Mr. Macdonald's case these are less obviously marked in consequence of residence in Canada from early childhood. The first peculiarity in the personal appearance of the Attorney-General is a striking likeness both in feature, expression and figure to the English Chancellor of the Exchequer. In a photograph of Mr. Macdonald, which came in our way before we saw the original, we were much struck by this resemblance. The only difference was in a certain wide-awake, knowing expression, an arch outlook for the main chance—"Disraeli looking round a corner?" we exclaimed. And true enough this is pretty much Mr. John A. Macdonald in his own proper person, and in character as well as appearance. He is a very clever man, what in America is called an uncommonly smart man,—ingenuous, rapid, full of resources, resolute in making use of them, and exceedingly apt, alike by his ingenuity and resolution, to baffle any opponent who may attempt to thwart him. That he is also unscrupulous in his proceedings occasionally we are bound to add, in recollection of recent Ministerial movements under his advice, which we have had occasion to notice unfavourably as they occurred. As a debater, he is ready and effective, more so than any other speaker in the House; the words come lightly and softly from his tongue, but in some cases with very savage and destructive intent, and with corresponding effect when the attack it not overdone. His health is delicate, his features are thin, and worn, with an expression of bright rusty intelligence in languid repose; the hair dangles over the forehead as in the case of the illustrious Ben; and there is the same stoop of the chest, and a weakness also of the lower limbs, giving altogether an appearance of physical fragility, which renders the intellectual life and vigor all the more interesting. Mr. Macdonald is by profession a lawyer, too shifty and unscrupulous, too anxious to carry his point, whatsoever it be, in particular about the morals, and more interest we fear, on attaining objects of secondary importance, than banking the opportunity, then on concerving and building up the interests of the country.

Mr. Brown, not having yet been in office, is not so open to such reasonable criticism, though he certainly does not escape that of his political opponents in Canada. If by no means, a moral rule in politics matters to the same, as his own private character is known to be clean and pure, there is no doubt that, although, as the Conservatives allege, his Reform views are not so extreme as they were when he first entered public life, he is still the head of the Clear Grit party, and the leader of the Opposition, after having failed in his attempt to form a Ministry on the retirement of Sir Allan M'Nab and Mr. Morin. Mr. Brown is a native of Edinburgh, and has all the characteristics of the Modern Athenian. He is a man of great energy and ability, and has manifested much power in pronouncing his views, and in bringing together an opposition party for their support. On the single question of the Catholic interest and influence he has somewhat modified his tone, but in that respect we think he has effected an improvement without descending to any compromise that may not be fairly classed among legitimate political expedients. Both in appearance and style of disposition he is, as we have said, entirely the opposite of Mr. Macdonald. He is full of fire and vigor, both physical and mental; a tall six foot two figure, with a remarkably Scotch face, particularly about the mouth and chin, which are expressive of great firmness and determination; an open gray eye, and forehead slightly bald in front; altogether a man in whose person and countenance, in attitude and expression, unusual animation and force of character are strongly marked. Our knowledge of Scotchmen in prominent positions is tolerably extensive, but we do not know of any one who has the force and determination of the national character more strongly pronounced than Mr. Brown. That a man of this stamp should be led into extremities is perhaps natural, and the position of Canadian affairs is such that extremes are scarcely avoidable. Moderation is all very well when comparative trifles are in dispute. But in Canada the questions at issue are of a very vital character, and the manifestations of a determined disposition are therefore pardonable. So far as Mr. Brown is concerned these do not go beyond statements of facts strongly put. His style of speaking is declamatory, but he declains facts and figures, which is a style of declamation not easily set aside. His statements are frequently challenged by his opponents and by the Government press, but we have not been able to discover any justification for the wholesale charges of inaccuracy which have been brought against him. We should be quite prepared to find a man of his disposition occasionally misled by his zeal for his own views, to which he naturally imparts a strong personal character that cannot fail to be aggravating to his opponents; but taking a candid view of matters, and placing his statements side by side with those of his opponents, as we have occasion to do almost weekly, we cannot find any grounds for impugning his accuracy in the manner to which the opposite side have recourse, apparently from not having anything better to say. Mr. Brown is proprietor of the Toronto Globe, which is not edited by him personally, however, but by his brother, and in which he seldom writes, his duties as a member of the Legislature and leader of the Opposition occupying all his time except what little he can spare for the oversight of business affairs.—He and Mr. Macdonald are within a few years of each other in point of age, the latter being over forty, and Mr. Brown somewhat under that age.

Life in Australia.

The following passages are extracted from a private letter from Melbourne, dated the 9th of November last:—

POOR GENTLEMEN IN AUSTRALIA.

As far as emigration from England is concerned, a man who cannot use the pickaxe and shovel, or some such tools, had better remain in England. From what I can hear, it is easier to do well in America than here. Gold mining is much altered from what it was. Instead of the gold being found near the surface, every day it is found to be more necessary to sink two or three hundred feet for it, and then, after working at a hole for six, twelve, or eighteen months, as likely as not, except to experienced men, there may not be enough to pay the first cost, very frequently nothing at all. Hundreds of men who followed mercantile pursuits in England are wandering about the streets of Melbourne and Sydney with nothing to do, and not knowing how soon they may be turned out of their lodgings, which they cannot pay for and for which they are already in debt. A friend of mine told me that a surgeon who not having sufficient capital to follow his profession had called to beg a crust of bread, He had offered to break stones on the road but was refused work because his hands were not hard enough, although he asked only to be paid what his labour was worth. There are hundreds like him. Or, worse than this, disheartened, they lose their self-respect, take to drink, and become pests to themselves and all who are unfortunate enough to know them; or, perhaps, they end their days in a lunatic asylum or a prison. So much for a poor gentleman in Australia.

AN OVERLAND EXPEDITION WITH STOCK.

We left Melbourne February 18, 1858, by steamer, and reached Sydney 21st February; it is about 600 miles northward from Melbourne. The harbour is exceedingly beautiful, being formed by seventeen or eighteen small bays which meet the eye one after the other striking from the Heads of the town. The land on all sides rises up, not very suddenly, and is covered with evergreen trees, and studded with the villas of the Sydney merchants, &c. There is nothing worth saying about the town, but the botanical gardens are the finest I have seen. They occupy a promontory between two of those bays, are well laid out and stocked, and are generally crowded on a Sunday. After buying horses and drays, tents and bedding, we left Sydney, March 2nd, for Bathurst, on a river of the same name, and the principal town of Morodon Bay district, about 200 miles from Sydney, and is near enough to the tropic for many tropical trees and plants. Reached Bathurst March 8, bought a few more horses, &c., and on March 10 began our land journey, which was not to end till we reached Victoria. From March 10 to August 10, I never slept in a bed. Our destination, after having Bathurst, was to station called Talgia, on the Landsmire river, Darling Plains, 121 miles, which we reached March 18, camping out, as it is called, every night, and which I will explain presently. The road to Talgai, from Brisbane, runs over a range of hills which follow the coast of Australia from north to south about 100 to 300 miles inland. In places they are exceedingly steep. Where we crossed them the road was obliged to wind about so much that from the foot of the rise to the top, it was between four and five miles, and in places so steep that drays coming down are compelled to have fastened behind them trees as thick round them as a man's body, and often much thicker, to serve as a clog, and even this is not sufficient sometimes. Our drays were nearly being smashed by one coming down, with six bullocks as hard as they could lay their legs to the ground. They had lost command of the dray, and there was no help for it but dash along as hard as they could till they got to a more level part of the road. Fortunately this was just before where we had drawn up to allow our horses to rest a little. On one side of the road the hill sloped off so steep for several hundred feet, that if they had not kept the road they would most of them have been killed. They were, however, an intelligent set of bullocks and came down safe.

We were detained at Talgia, branding 14,000, till the evening of March 22nd.—On March 23rd we started with them for Victoria. They were driven in four flocks with two shepherds to each. Our party consisted of four English and four German shepherds, a cook, a horse driver, the superintendant, and myself, rode on horseback, the rest were on foot; our bedding consisted of two or three blankets; our houses, a tent and a tarpaulin thrown over the dray. Those who could afford it had a change of boots, trousers, socks, and shirts. These, with flour, tea, sugar, casks for holding water in case of need, a spade, an axe, and sundry other tools, with over coats for rough weather, were carried on the dray. A sheep was killed every day or nearly so. There were twelve of us to eat it, besides numerous dogs. Every hundred miles or so there are stores along the road, which furnish overlanders, as men travelling with stock are called, with what they require, and are paid by an order on a merchant in Sydney, who gives an order back on their house for the purpose. The super left me in charge of the Talgai sheep to go for 600 more at another station. He met me again when I was one hundred and twenty miles on the road. The order of proceeding is as follows:—At daybreak we breakfast, the men tie up their swags—that is their bedding, and at sunrise I walk through the sheep, dividing them into four as even flocks as possible, and send them along by the road, two flocks on each side.—About two hours after the dray starts, and I ride on to look out a camping ground for the night. On an average, a day's journey is about five or six miles, though sometimes we are compelled, for want of water or feed, to go ten and twelve miles. When we have any doubt of water we carry it in the casks. The sheep feed the whole way, and are mostly at or close to the camp before sundown. They do not walk more than they would do on a station, when feeding. In the summer time they lie down for two or three hours in the middle of the day.—When the dray arrives at the camp the horses are turned out to feed till the next morning; their fore-legs are strapped together with a chain a foot long to prevent their walking too far in the night. The cook lights the fire and bakes bread, and prepares supper. At sundown the sheep are driven to the camping ground, and five or six large fires lighted round them, which are kept bright till daybreak. The men watch by turns, one at a time. The night is divided into three watches. After supper the men sit round the fires, or, if the weather is warm, lie on the grass smoking their pipes, yarn (tell tales), &c. play tricks on one another, or quarrel, as the case may be, till they are tired, and then they turn in or roll themselves up in their blankets.—The fires are for the purpose of fencing a kind of yard for the sheep, which soon become accustomed to it, and, if they are not disturbed, lie quiet the whole night, if they have had plenty to eat in the day time.—Sometimes they will take a fright and run out of the camp, and nothing can stop them. This is very awkward in a dark night. The fires are also serviceable for keeping the native dogs away, who frequently make havoc of the sheep, scattering them in all directions. The men sleep on the ground, in the tent, or under the dray, or by the fires. The more careful will pull small boughs off the trees and lay on them. If properly done this makes as comfortable a bed as a mattress, and it keeps the sleeper off the ground, and in wet weather he will be quite dry, if the tent does not fall down, as it frequently does when well soaked with rain, wetting all the blankets and clothes. In such cases there is nothing to do but to grin and bear it. Fortunately it does not often rain so long together, but blankets, &c. can be dried in the sun or by the fires for the next night. The super and overseers sleep with the men. This is the general routine. Sometimes, however, one or more of the flocks take the wrong road, or going too far from it, lose themselves. It is then the duty of the overseer to find them and bring them to the camp. Sometimes the men will allow the sheep to separate, and 400 or 500 will be left in the bush. Sometimes the horses cannot be found. We lost two.

The super, or overseer, must see all these things, and if the super cannot do what is necessary—they must! As I have to leave writing till to-morrow, I will here say that the sheep were delivered in the Murray on the 10th August, being twenty-one weeks from the time they left the station. There is a track nearly the whole way to place on a turnpike road. The country was so dry that for 200 miles they walked over all the grass and water-courses. A year ago I saw them so filled water, that we were frequently unable to cross them, even when bringing bullocks overland. I was once on the Narroon (west the water not up to my horse; other times dogs and four stages separate, and the other goes to within one foot and a half

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET never would be driven by popular motives to that which he believed was not desirable for the country. He desired to make allusion, not in a spirit of partisanship, but merely for the purpose of calling them to the attention of hon. gentleman. In this House, at any rate, no one ever questioned for a moment the propriety of the changes which took place. Nor was it much questioned until newspaper articles were written and spread over the country with a view of exciting the popular mind. In the other branch of the Legislature, though questioned, the course taken by the present ministry was sustained. He (Mr. Vankoughnet) never had the least doubt of its propriety. His own opinion was, and he believed he might say also the opinion of the Attorney General West, that they might at once have returned to the seats they originally held. In that view, he was happy to say, the courts of law had concurred. It was asked why they did not do that. Simply because there was one word in the Act which might possibly have interfered with their course. When the Speaker of the other House, who had drawn up the Bill, was appealed to, he said he supposed the word had crept in by mistake; that was all the information which could be got from him. At all events the ministry felt they were within the spirit of the law and determined to be within its letter also. No one could forget how anxious the House was that the business of the country should be proceeded with. If he (Mr Vankoughnet) had proposed to this House to resign—if he had placed his resignation in the Speaker's hand—the only course open to him, since his seat was not vacated by law; if he had asked that the business of the country should stand still while he (Mr. Vankoughnet) went back to seek re-election from his constituents, it would have been refused by an almost unanimous vote of the House—such a proposition would have been laughed at. Hon. gentlemen might yield to popular clamour and feeling, but we were here to correct popular prejudices. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to argue from a speech of Lord John Russell, that the law which provided that ministers should go to their constituents, was merely on the question of receiving an emolument from the Crown, not upon the policy of the Government.—Lord John Russell had advocated the abolition of this law, as also had Hallam, who was also quoted by the hon. gentleman. Hallam contended that the fate of a Ministry should not be placed in the hands of one constituency, but in that of the whole House. The hon. gentleman at great length dwelt upon the inconvenience attendant upon the practice of sending members back to their constituents, inasmuch as it was sometimes prejudicial of great injury to the country, and declared the path of his opinion in a few words to be, that to compel a member who took office to return to his constituents, was not called for by the constitution, and was not only not in accordance with the spirit of the Act of Parliament, but entirely contrary to it. He knew that such a declaration would cause him to be much misrepresented; and if he were ever foolish enough to seek re-election, would be used against him; but he spoke what he believed to be right, and did not fear the consequences.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said it was perfectly evident from the declaration of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, that until the Augean stable was thoroughly cleansed—until the whole "pack" was turned out—the country would never be satisfied.—The feeling which prevailed was not the mere result of newspaper discussion; the cry rang throughout the country. He was perfectly sure of this, whatever might have been thought in England, that no man in public life in Canada could introduce a bill for the abrogation of this principle and receive the approbation of his constituents. (Hear, hear.) The people felt that the Ministry had dishonestly treated their opponents.—We had heard a good of late about the loyalty of Canada to our gracious Queen; but a greater stab had been given to that loyalty by the course the Ministry had pursued than a hundred rebellions with a premier at the head of each. He sincerely thanked his hon. friend for bringing in this bill, and would give him a hearty support.

Hon. Col. PRINCE could not vote in favour of the Bill before the House, as it did not go far enough. The original Act, which provided for members going to their constituents upon the acceptance of office, contained an atrocious clause which prevented a Queen's Counsel holding a brief for Her Majesty if a member of either House, which clause ought certainly to be repealed. He was not in favour of the abolition of the law which compelled acceptors of office in Parliament to return to their constituents, considering it a constitutional safeguard to which the people were entitled.

Hon. Mr. DESSAULLES thought that, before proceeding by Bill, resolutions disapproving of the way in which the present Ministry had returned to their offices should first have been proposed, and he (Mr. Dessaulles) had in fact intended to move such resolutions, with the view of founding a Bill upon them. He was sorry his hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) had not pursued that course. The opinion was universal throughout the country that the act of the Ministry in coming back to their places without seeking the sanction of their constituents was wrong in the extreme, and that such things should by all means be prevented hereafter. He did not believe the bill now before the House would have that effect. He wanted also to prevent any and every change of offices by Ministers; and unless this were done in his opinion, there would be continued heart-burning in the country would continue to be divided and by such shuffles as we had witnessed in August last. He had no hesitation in saying that if he were told to-morrow that a personal acquaintance with all the Ministers that they were going to resign, and that a new Ministry had been formed, he would not know a single individual in their Cabinet. He would have been a very much surprised indeed if Mr. Cartier had not been found in the Cabinet. He knew of no case of the kind in the history of the British Empire, where the Ministry had returned to their seats without seeking re-election. He would rather have seen the Ministry resign their seats—have taken the same course as the Brown-Dorion Ministry had done—and then returned again to their seats. It would have been a very much better effect in their favour. He would have [illegible]

REFORMATORY PRISONS.

Hon. Mr. DEBLAQUIRE inquired of the Ministry what had been done in the establishment of the Juvenile Reformatory Prisons in Upper and Lower Canada, in pursuance of the Act of last Session; and if it was their intention to appoint immediately the permanent Inspectors of the said Prisons at Penetanguishene and Isle aux Noix.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET replied that Reform Prisons had been established at both places. The one at Isle aux Noix had been organized early in the fall, the other, Penetanguishene, in December last. At both places Inspectors or Wardens as they were called, had been appointed, and were now in charge of the establishments. The Warden appointed to the Isle aux Noix had formerly been one of the Inspectors of the Penitentiary, at Kingston; and his great experience had induced the Government to transfer him from the one place to the other. At Penetanguishene preparations were being made for the reception of convicts. It was thought by the time the Spring Assizes commenced, early in March, the establishment would be ready for the convicts it may be found desirable to send there.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved the second reading of a Bill to amend the law of securing the independence of Parliament. The hon. gentleman explained that it was his wish not to prevent Ministers executing an internal change in the Cabinet, but to prevent Ministers after they had resigned office going back to their old places without the consent of their constituents. It was impossible in discussing the propriety of the Bill now before the House, to avoid alluding to the circumstances which took place last session and which, in his judgment, made an alteration in Act of Parliament. Those circumstances were fresh in the memory of hon. members. He thought however much this House might differ as to the course pursued by the Ministry, they must all agree upon this, that the operation of the existing law was on that occasion most unfair as between the two great parties with which Parliament was divided. We had on the one hand the members of the Brown-Dorion Administration holding office only a few hours, forced to their constituents, driven from the House at a time of very great importance to them. On the other hand we had the members of the present Administration returning to office without being obliged to go to their constituents, and enjoying the very great advantage of being present in Parliament and voting in the House. It was usual, and had been, found an advantageous and a proper restraint upon persons in public life, that when men did accept office they should obtain the approbation of their constituents. The hon. gentleman concluded by saying that whether the course taken by the present Administration was in accordance with law or not, it had caused the greatest dissatisfaction among the people.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN seconded the motion. Of the necessity which existed for the passage of such a law there could be no doubt. Anything which tended to weaken the confidence of the people in the good faith of the Government was productive of the most injurious consequences. That the members of the present Administration in the country had perused, although in [illegible] conscientiously, had taken advantage of a law which was not intended for the purpose, was the opinion of a great part of the people. He had much pleasure in [illegible] the motion of the hon. friend (Mr. Campbell)

ELECTION COMMITTEE.

The members composing the General Committee on Elections were sworn in.

Upon motion of Mr. E. P. TACHE the petitions presented against the return of certain members were referred to the committee.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON introduced a Bill to repeal certain sections of the Common Law Procedure Act relating to Bills of Exchange.

SALE OF LIQUORS.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL reported from the Select Committee, with amendment, the Bill he had introduced to restrain the sale of intoxicating liquors from Saturday night until Monday morning.

Hon. Col. PRINCE complained that the Bill unjustly prevented the labouring man from taking his glass of ale, and from smoking his pipe on the Saturday night after his hard week's work. We had no right to assume in legislating, that the majority of men who went to taverns and saloons spent the greater part of their earning there on the Saturday night, and he [Col. Prince] knew that such was not the case. There were no clubs, no reading rooms, where respectable men could meet and associate together, for the exchange of ideas. What was a man to do? Was he to walk about the streets all day with a face as long as a Methodist preacher, who had lived on cold water all day. The hon. gentleman contended that the hour of closing on Saturday night should be ten o'clock, instead of seven o'clock as proposed in the bill, and that the words "travellers while travelling and sojourners while lodging at," the place where liquors were sold be excepted from the operation of the Act.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL was afraid if such alterations were made the mischief they hoped to avoid would be as rampant as ever He had no desire to legislate for one class of the community and to let another go free, but it must be admitted that the abuse has been so great, an alteration was necessary. The hon. gentleman also objected to the amendment proposed by Col. Prince, upon the ground that where the same words had been introduced into the Act in England, they had opened the door to great abuses, owing to the difficulty of interpreting the word traveller.

Hon. Mr. CROOKS said he agreed with the hon. and gallant Colonel that the taverns ought not to be closed before 10 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said they might just as well keep the taverns open all night The Bill would remedy a very great evil if carried as it now stood.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET agreed that if the Bill were to be effective, the taverns must be closed at seven o'clock. He proposed an amendment to the third clause, that all proceedings taken under the Act should be begun within twenty days from the date of the offence.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL accepted the alteration and the report was adopted.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

The House then adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

The War Question.

THE SARDINIAN ARMY.

From the Times Correspondent.

TURIN, January 26.—The war party appears to be a little less confident this last day or two, and the public generally seems inclined to take a more pacific view of affairs. The difference, however, is but a shade; there is no revival of confidence, and all business is at a stand-still. The commercial class is, anything but well pleased at this state of things.

At this moment it is not uninteresting to give a glance at the state and arrangements of the Piedmontese army. The conscription here includes all men on their arrival at 21 years of age, the number of whom is computed to be annually about 18,000. Of these the first 9,000 drawn by lot compose what is called the first category, and are incorporated in the army. They serve five years under arms, and eleven under the colours—that is to say, that at the expiration of their five years' service they return to their houses, taking with them their uniforms and weapons, and remain, for six years liable to serve when called upon. The Piedmontese army of trained soldiers ought therefore, to consist of 90,000 men, 45,000 actually serving and 45,000 having served and ready to re-join at a few day's notice. But, allowing for deaths, incapacitation by illness and accident, soldiers who become only sons by the death of a brother, and are therefore exempt, &c., it cannot, I think, be correctly estimated at more than 85,000 men of this category. According to the existing law, passed in 1854, the second category comprises all young men, liable to the conscription, who are not included in the first. Previously to that (and reckoning from 1839,) only a portion of those who drew a favorable number (beyond the 9,000 taken) were liable to be called upon to serve until they completed the 25th year. The existing second category, or reserve, may be reckoned at about 30,000. These are called out annually, for a short term of drill, which does not make soldiers of them but gives them some rudimentary knowledge, smartens them up a little, and qualifies them to be incorporated, in case of need, and in judicious proportions, in regiments of trained soldiers. If we estimate the Sardinian army, including both categories, at 112,000 to 115,000 men, it will be about the mark, and this is a great deal more than the country can afford.

The Univers addresses some unpalatable truths to the partizans of war:—

"No motives exist for a war. All the arguments brought forward in its favour are disproved by historical traditions and the right of nations. At no period did Italy form a compact nation; even under Roman rule it lived only a municipal life. To the recollection of that rule it owed its glory and prosperity in the middle ages; its inheritance is still valuable, and it would run the risk of foolishly forfeiting it by accepting a political unity which would reduce its ancient states to the rule of departments or provinces. Frenchmen are familiar with the road to Italy; there exists no land where they have fought more often. What has been the result of all these invasions? The fine campaign of General Bonaparte had no other consequence than to deliver up the Republic of Venice to Austria. We lost Italy by our defeats under Charles VIII. Louis XII., and Francis I. The Milanese territory had been in the possession of the House of Austria for above 150 years. The Austrian soldiers, at Montebello, Campo-Maggiore, Palestro, and Magenta, [illegible] Frenchmen [illegible] Italy [illegible] Austria [illegible] Austrian [illegible] Austrian [illegible] Austrian that light, showed form flatter before me like some receding angel in the soft morning twilight. Observe, I am writing of a type, simply. Not even as a type do I dare to risk voting any further this tall, fine-looking thoroughly womanly Miss Gwin whose whole dress trimmed with flowers, whose whole dress trimmed with flowers, heightens the youthful charm of the young lady whom "Jotkins," drunk as usual, o "one of Bedad, flown with insolence and wine," has just been engaged to be married. And on the whole I shall abstain from naming anybody else. New York was here, also Philadelphia, and especially Baltimore. Will any chemist have the kindness to analyse Baltimore, and discover what its secret potencies are for enchanting "the female form divine?" Meanwhile descending upon the sublunary fact of toilette, I am forced to say that, though there were, of course, some charming exceptions, the fashion as a rule did not dress well. To dress well a woman needs to study first the requirements of her own person, next the circumstances under which she is to appear and lastly the impression to be produced on others. By blending these objects she reaches that ideal of perfection to which dress may be brought when fancy is chastened and directed by thought. How few ladies dress well, and what is dressing detestably but the most intense self-shows in refusing the thought necessary to create that grace of design and harmony of colour which makes a well dressed woman a refreshing delight! How rare for instance in France, where they understand dress, to see, as we saw last night, ladies of thirty-five and forty-five dressed with the naivete of school girls, clashing in every curve with angular forms and bristling like a bundle of open pen-knives. We saw several ladies of even greater age exhibiting necks from which the charms had long since taken wings, and arms more like sticks of sealing-wax than coral. It is the remarkable harmony between the characters of the dress and the requirements of her age which imparts to the appearance of the French woman from the Faubourg St. Germain to the Marrais, from the fashionable women of Paris, to the fisherwomen of Boulogne, a certain pleasing unity which is the characteristic of Gallic grace. This effort to please may be rooted in vanity, but it is a blessed vanity which teaches to adorn and beautify life. Impudent men may be trusted with that forwardness which belongs to them for forcing their merits on the world, but women with her delicacy of feeling must make dress a symbolic language, almost speaking the character of her mind. Then we had some unfortunates who were fearfully overdressed. One lady from New York appeared like a mail with all her fortune on her back. Her naturally handsome proportions was positively obscured with jewelry, and she looked dingy with diamonds and sinnees.

But notwithstanding the crowd of distinguished persons who thronged the room to-night, crush-ring it perhaps the most brilliant ball that Washington has seen, it would be idle flattery not to state that the gathering lacked that peculiar cachet which marks similar occasions in Europe where such reunions comprise the sovereigns of the nation in rank and mind. But here the people are their own sovereigns, and officials at Washington, with some exceptions, more resemble clerks than statesmen. There is more about the men of sinewing self-handedness than of the aroma of cultivated society.

As it was, the women completely carried away the honors to-night. After all, it is but natural that where institutions do not favour the entrance of the best men into public life, the woman element, so brilliant everywhere, should utterly out-dazzle the other sex, and make the most masculy woman appear an angel by the side of a tobacco-chewing deputy. But, apart from this, there is much in the American woman to make her show to advantage in elegant society, as she always does in Europe.—There are doubtless, many who, had they remained in Europe, would perhaps at this time be the wives and daughters of English baronets, or eminent barristers, or something of that kind. But, on the whole, they spring from the glorious working class.—There is no "embarras d'ancetres" about them. They are not incumbered with family pedigrees, which generally produce a kind of feudal cramp in the nature, and confine it within an agony of reserve and restraint. Wherever reserve or restraint are more here, this is assumed, not natural, and like all that is not natural, vulgar. Around the women to-night there was a charming vive les jeux, vive la bagatelle, ineffably delightful. There is something exquisitively refreshing in a fine plebeian girl with a nature of imperial independance that can cope with Queens and Duchesses. We saw some charming specimens of this class, with a high-bred Duchess Georgiana curve of the neck, and the head most sweetly set on.—But though they were called the Hon. Miss So-and-so, or Mrs. Senator So-and-so, they were only shop-a damsels in disguise, semi-Grecian, semi-Parisian, fond of laughing, dancing, flirting, passionately fond of strong men who have made their mark, but wished with a smile for any fancy man in distress, even for Jenkins. There were some splete looking ladies, under whose cloak of decorum there lurked the natural female demon of sprightliness. There were some big-hearted, broadchy looking Massachusetts ladies, stout uncompromising Emersonians, but they trance ideutalized amid the crowd, and came back to earth the moment dance or supper was announced.—What with some such ladies looking of the 24th century, and some of the sunny Southern who looked of the 15th, the 19th constituted a kind of charming balance,—rich in fascinating wealth.

THE THREATENED WAR ON THE CONTINENT!

Opening of the French Legislature!

SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR!!

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS IN THE FRENCH DOCKYARDS AND ARSENALS.

PREPARATIONS FOR HOSTILITIES IN AUSTRIA AND PIEDMONT.

FRANCE.

The session of the French Legislature opened on the 7th instant, with an important speech from the Emperor. He commenced by referring to the existing epidemic, stating that it was excited without any apparent and imminent danger; and after expressing regret at the disquietude, and referring to his peaceful policy as a proof of his assertion, he proceeded as follows:—

"To-day it is my duty to explain again to you that which appears to me you have forgotten. What have ever been my principles? The necessity, I repeat, to restore France to her true position, to support treaties duly sanctioned by her with England, and to regulate with the Continental Powers all questions without up-rage questions, according to the requirements of our times and the dignity of France. It was in conformity with these principles that I made at Bordeaux the declaration, "The Empire is Peace." I was anxious to prove by that expression, that although the heir of Napoleon the First had ascended the throne, he would inaugurate a system which could only be disturbed for the purpose of defending great national interests. With respect to the alliance with England I have used all my perseverance to consolidate it, and I have found on the other side of the channel a happy reciprocation of sentiment on the part of the Queen, as on the part of all statesmen, of every shade of opinion. Also to attain that end so valuable to the peace of the world have I thrown aside all opportunities of reviving irritating remembrances of the past, even the calumnious attacks dictated by prejudice and the national antipathies of my own country. This alliance has borne its fruits. Not only have we acquired together a lasting glory in the East, but at the extremity of the world we have just opened an immense empire to the progress of civilization and of the Christian religion. Since the establishment of peace, my relations with Russia have assumed a character of the frankest cordiality, because we are agreed upon all the points in dispute. I am equally justified in congratulating myself on my relations with Prussia, which have never ceased to be animated with mutu l good will.—The Cabinet of Vienna and that of France, on the contrary—I speak it with regret,—have disagreed upon important questions, and it required a most conciliatory spirit to succeed in arranging them. For instance, the reconstruction of the Danubian Principalities has not been completed without many difficulties, which diminished the full satisfaction of their most legitimate desires, and I, if I were asked what interest France has in those distant countries watered by the Danube, I should reply, that the interests of France is everywhere where there is a just cause, and where civilization ought to be made to prevail. In this state of things there is nothing extraordinary that France should draw closer to Piedmont, which proved herself so devoted during the war, so faithful to our policy during peace. The happy union of my well-beloved cousin, Prince Napoleon, with the daughter of King Victor Emmanuel is not one of those unusual facts to which some hidden reason must be attributed, but the natural consequence of the community of interests of the two countries and of the friendship of the two sovereigns. For some time past the state of Italy and her abnormal position, where order cannot be obtained except by foreign troops, gives just cause of anxiety to diplomacy. This, however, is not a sufficient motive to give rise to the belief in war. Some may invoke it with all their hearts without legitimate reason, and others in their exaggerated fears endeavour to show to France the dangers of a new coalition; but I shall remain firm and invulnerable in the path of right and justice and of national honour, and my government will not allow itself to be led away or intimidated, because my policy will never be provocative or pusillanimous. Far be from us, then, these false alarms, these unjust suspicions, these interested apprehensions, as peace, I hope, will not be disturbed. Resume then calmly the usual course of your labours. I have explained to you the state of our foreign relations, and this explanation corresponds with all that I have made known during the last two months both at home and abroad. You will, I flatter myself, find that my policy has never ceased to be otherwise than firm, but conciliatory.—Therefore I confidently rely upon your support, as well as that of the nation, which has entrusted its fate to me. It is well known that I never shall permit personal interest or petty ambition to guide my actions. When supported by popular sentiment we ascend a throne and acquire no grave a responsibility, we rise far above that infamous region where vulgar interests are debated, and the first motives of our actions, as our last judges, are God, conscience, and posterity."

The speech was variously commented on by the press: notwithstanding its pacific language, its effects on funds was not favourable. Prior to the delivery of the speech on the 7th, the Paris Bourse was excited and buoyant, and the rentes advanced one to one-and-a-half per cent. Subsequently a decline took place, and after the publication of the speech the rentes were quoted only at one quarter higher than on the previous day.

The London Exchange sympathized with Paris. Consols before the speech advanced one-half, but a re-action ensued, and they closed only a quarter higher. On the following day both markets fluctuated slightly, and a firmer tone prevailed.

It is stated that at a recent ball at the Tuileries a lady fainted, or, from some cause of a similar nature, confusion ensued. The Emperor and Empress fled from the throne and made their way as precipitately as possible across the salon, the Empress gathering up her petticoats with her hand as best she might, and looked as pale that her best friends said that "it was death-like to look at."

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says:—"A law-suit of no ordinary interest is expected to occupy the attention of one of the civil courts next week. All money-lenders of Lond n will remember that some twelve years ago Prince Louis Napoleon, when desperately hard up, was continually endeavouring to raise the wind upon a mortgage of alleged claims upon the French Government in respect of the property of his mother, Queen Hortense.—Prospectuses setting forth his title to countless millions, which he offered to the public in shares of convenient amount, were profusely circulated, but met with small favour from the moneyed interest, either in Houndsditch or elsewhere. It is however, now stated by M M. de Cock and Terwangne, bankers, of Antwerp, plaintiffs in an action brought again His Majesty Napoleon III., in his courts, that, in 1847, one M. Aristide Ferrere obtained from Louis Napoleon for valuable consideration, an assignment of all his [the prince's] rights and credits against the French Government, as the representative of Queen Hortense, his mother Pursuant to this assignment, title-deeds valued at 10,000,000 francs were deposited with M. de Prime, a French notary in London. M. A. Ferrere, in order to render his security readily negotiable, divided the ten millions in 100 shares, of 100,000 francs each. Two of the shares were deposited with the plaintiffs by way of mortgage, for money owing to them by Ferrere. Ferrere had never paid his debt, and now Messrs. Cock and Terwangne, availing themselves of the French law, which allows the sovereign to be sued in the civil courts, like any other citizens, bring their action. One difficulty in their way is that, in 1852, the Prince President, when he confiscated the property of the Orleans family, declared in the Moniteur that he would release the State from all his claims to his mother fortune. The plaintiffs contended that the release can not be binding upon them as purchasers for a valuable consideration; but that, in all events, the Emperor having cancelled the shares which were negotiated with his sanction and privity, is personally liable to them. On the other hand, the validity of the assignment to Ferrere is contested by the Emperor."

AUSTRIA.

A Vienna despatch says that Austria has consented to withdraw from the Roman States on conditions of a similar step on the part of France. The Daily News, noticing this matter, hints that Austria's motive in making the proposal, may be to stimulate subscriptions to the six million loan now being raised.

Letters from Vienna mention the probability of another four million sterling loan being brought forward if the present negotiations are successful.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Attorney General Whiteside has been elected to Parliament, unopposed, by the Dublin University.

The London Times has a playful editorial on the proposed appropriation of thirty millions of dollars by the United States for the purchase of Cuba, and strongly recommends the system to the notice of the Emperor Napoleon. It says that America has certainly deepened the science and enlarged the jurisdiction of money.

It was reported that Archbishop Cullen would be made a cardinal, to permanently reside at Rome.

The Prince of Wales had paid a formal visit to the Pope.

The discount market continued steady, and the supply of money abundant. The rates for first-class bills were 2 to 2¼ per cent.

The London Daily News says, the rumoured delay in the production of Sir John Packington's plans for providing for the defence of the country by the navy, is caused by important differences of opinion within the Cabinet. It is also again asserted that an extensive system of fortifications has received the partial sanction of the government. The plan consists of a series of fortifications, placed at intervals along the seaboard.

The ships Norfolk, with £160,000, and the Clutha with £48,000, had arrived from Australia.

The Stock Exchange was comparatively steady, but without material improvement, the fluctuation of the three days being scarcely one-quarter per cent.

FRANCE.

Paris letters continue to dilate upon the Emperor's speech. The London Times' correspon lent says:—"If any slight change supervened upon reflection, it is perhaps more in favour of a pacific than warlike interpretation. The same uncertainty prevailed, but without any increased alarm."

The same authority says, that the allusions to peace in Count de Morny's speech to the Legislative Corps were received with restrained cheers.

The Daily News says the latest news is altogether warlike.

The Paris Bourse on the 9th opened buoyantly, and advanced one-half per cent, but a reduction took place, and the advance was nearly all lost. On the 10th the market opened firm, but closed dull and lower. On the 11th the market was dull and depressed, the appearance of a pamphlet by Girardin, entitled "La Guerre," causing some uneasiness. The three per cents declined a quarter, closing at 68f. for money, and 67f. 95c. for account.

The monthly returns of the Bank of France show a decrease in specie of one million francs, and an increase in deposits of twenty-three and a-half millions.

ITALY.

Milan letters describe continued military preparations on a large scale, especially in artillery.

RUSSIA.

It was stated that the Russian army would shortly be concentrated on the Austrian-Gallician frontier, and that the tone of the Russian journals towards Austria was daily becoming more severe.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

The reply of the Queen of England to the petition of the Parliament for a union of the islands with Greece is, that she declines to accede to the request.

TURKEY.

Kibritza Mahomued Pacha had been dismissed.

The Porte will protest against the election of Couza as Hospodar in Wallachia.

PERSIA.

It was reported that the populace at Herat had expelled the English Commissioner.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The Calcutta mail of January 9, and Hong Kong of December 30 had reached England, and the American portion of the same is on the Canada.

The campaign in Oude was considered nearly over. The rebels were hopelessly beaten everywhere.

The Governor General had issued a decree for disarming the whole of Upper India.

Small fortifications are to be erected at every station in the Northwest, so as to render the seizure of treasure simultaneous, and the massacre of Europeans both difficult and hazardous.

Arrival of the City of Baltimore.

NEW YORK, March 1.

The City of Baltimore arrived here at two o'clock this morning.

The steamer Jura which was to have left Liverpool simultaneously with the Canada anchored in the Mersey for the night, owing to a fog, and was run into by a Dublin steamer. She lost her figure head, cut water, and had to go into dock. The cargo is not damaged; She was expected to sail about the 12th.

The House of Lords debated the Right of Search question. Lord Malmesbury said that the code of instructions for the suppression of the slave trade, agreed to by England and France has been submitted to the United States. Disraeli promised to bring in the Reform Bill on 28th Feb.—He also announced that the government would not give an unconditional guarantee to the Atlantic or any other submarine telegraph.

The naval estimates are only increased about one million sterling.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 16—Breadstuffs generally dull and drooping. Flour; barrels nominally unchanged, sacks 24 cheaper per central. Wheat dull and rather easier; red western 8s 9d a 9s 3d, white 9s 7d a 10s, southern 10s a 10s 3d per central. Corn quiet and unchanged; mixed and yellow 5s 10d a 6s 2d, white 7s 1d a 7s 6d.

Provisions generally unchanged. Pork quiet, but firm; lard quiet, but held for 60s; cheese firm, sales 28s 6d, parels 29s; sugar quiet, but steady.

London consols 93¾ to 93¾. Money and account steady.

Breadstuffs dull and unchanged; sugar, from mess cutes 6d dearer; cotton and hid well supported.

Wire rumors cautious, but rate quieting has prevailed.

Orangemen in Toronto.

There appears, in another part of this paper, a report of certain proceedings, taken at a full meeting of Orangemen, in the St. Lawrence Hall, at Toronto, on the 24th of last month. The meeting was remarkable, from the number attending it, the high social position of the chairman, the ostensible object for which it was convened, and the unconcealed determination of the leaders, to enforce political submission from ordinary members. The honorable John Hilyard Cameron, a Queen's Counsel, took the chair, and entered into a defence of the Orange Institution, claiming for it a purity of motive, and for all and every one of its members, an innocence of outrage, which it was far beyond the power of man to gainsay. Before commenting upon the sentiments expressed by the speakers, and accepted by the other members, a duty we take upon ourselves without any hesitation, as a resolvent of public opinion, we desire first to draw attention to the commendable disposition manifested on the part of both Protestants and Roman Catholics at this time, to take an enlarged view of the circumstances of their political and social relation. United, in nearly equal proportions, as to aggregate numbers, and interspersed among each other, in such a manner as make each capable of giving pain or pleasure to his neighbor, the thought cannot but be acceptable to every true patriot, that peace and good-will should continue to be the prevailing characteristic of the intercourse in every neighborhood. To preserve this state of feeling, so happily subsisting, the essential condition is that there be a reciprocal forbearance, and a mutual respect and confidence; without them the apparent peace will be but a truce, open to infraction upon the slightest opportunity.—The Orange Institution, called into existence by the extremities to which an ambitious but numerically weak party in the land of its nativity, was then reduced, by an exasperated foe, while it sheltered itself under the plea of necessity, and confined itself strictly to the repression of assault from without, and the legitimate support and comfort of its own members, had an apology for the erection of an independent power within the Kingdom, which under other circumstances, however, might be objected to it. There are seasons of alarm, when by the natural timidity of mankind, they rush with precipitancy from the appearance of danger, and by their preponderance create that danger where they expected peace. In the first years of the settlement of Upper Canada, no wonder need be expressed at the introduction from Ireland, of a branch of the society which the protestants of that country had been accustomed to venerate, as the means under which they had been enabled to preserve themselves, in the midst of an unsettled population. They emigrated with the traditions of their ancestors, and the recollection of their own adventures, strongly impressed upon their memories, and when they met their traditionary oppressors, on neutral ground, bethought themselves of the expedient of their long cherished association to preserve anew the landmark which should divide them, while its traces could be discovered. Such without doubt, is the origin of the exotic plant, in this Province. Let us now look calmly into it, and try to discover the advantages it brings in its train the benefits it scatters over the land, the peace and mutual good-will it would fain establish between its own, and the great number who are either looked upon with indifference, or who, by proscription, are especially held in aversion. To read Mr. Cameron's address, which proceeding from one of honourable, whose intelligence, social superiority, and comprehensive power are unsurpassed by any in the order, one finds that they claim respect especially from the protestant portion of the community: wherea, an honorable mind would claim that they should have the respect of such as by their opinions are incapable of membership. To please ones own party is the work of no great effort, since they are already predisposed; but to be respected by those who from the nature of things, cannot approve, is not too high an object of ambition. Mr. Cameron regards the Association as the means of rallying loyal courageous Protestant men around the Throne. Is the Throne, then, in danger! And, is it a means of safety, to tell one half of the natural defenders of the country, by implication that they are traitors and enemies of the State? Who does England look to in times of distress, to man her navy, and fill her regiments? Does she not them turn, as well to the Roman Catholic as the Orangeman, and has she not always had reason to be proud of her Irish troops!—Let us beware how, instead of cherishing a jealous honor, we refuse the meed of praise, lest, when, if ever it should unhappily arise, that the Throne is in danger, our words be returned upon us, and a high spirited people withdraw in our day of tribulation by refusing to battle in a cause that contemplates only their degradation. Mr. Cameron throws out the idea not only that Orangeism is the special preservative of the British constitution, but that another principal feature consists in its fidelity to the Anglican Church, or, as he styles it, "the religion upon which the Throne is based." Dissenters, therefore, still find themselves neighbored, when enrolled in its brotherhood. So far, we have approached the subject generally; let us now consider particularly the professed object of the meeting. The report, and the resolutions passed, describe it to have been for the purpose of denouncing the Council and Police Commissioners for rejecting the applications of members of secret societies to appointments in the Police force of the city. Abstractedly, it would appear tyrannical to proscribe any man or any class of men from office, because of their opinions, and none but the strongest reasons ought to be allowed to provoke such a course. If however, men prefer to bind themselves together for mutual protection, independently of the law of the land though still entitled to its shelter where they obey it, they cannot with justice complain if citizens who are not regarded equally by them, should prefer to see the laws carried out by unbound hands. Mr. Cameron declares that Orangemen are to stand by each other on all just occasions, and adds that what is a just and what is an unjust occasion is left to the determination of each man's conscience. Now, to stand by each other implies that there is somebody else to be withstood, and that is what the public are concerned with. We all know what prejudice is, and with unenlightened minds how difficult to remove it. Public opinion has spoken out in Toronto, and for the sake of peace merely asks of the applicant for civil power, that he shall renounce those private obligations he has voluntarily assumed, and free himself from a possible conflict between his duty to society at large and his private engagements. The real motive of collecting the meeting is seen at the close of Mr. Cameron's speech. He conjures his brethren to go to the polls without division; and the meeting responded to his call. It is to be hoped they will reconsider their decision, as nothing they could do, would tend quicker to bring the Order into contempt, than the position, once fairly assumed, that it is a secret political association. Mr. William Hopkins added a couple of brilliant sentiments to the Speech of the Honorable Chairman. He condemned Orangemen for voting at Municipal Elections for Roman Catholic Candidates; and set up the monstrous doctrine that a man, being once an Orangeman, was always an Orangeman. As to voting for men of opposite persuasions; that, each one may decide for himself; but they will hardly succeed in confining a man's opinions, so as that he shall not be allowed to separate himself from what he subsequently disapproves A subject cannot break his allegiance to his native land—he carries it from his birth to his grave; but the will, which was free to separate him from the mass, is as free to release him from servitude.

One of the Resolutions expresses the hope, that Country Lodges will hold meetings of a similar kind, that there may be no difficulty when an election comes on, of putting the machinery in motion, to make the Orange vote tell as one man. Gentlemen of the Gowan stamp are arranging themselves to make use of the promised millenium. One gentleman in this County, a discarded M. P. P. whose character has suffered lately in the Court of Chancery, is said to have made application; but whether or not his morals will come up to the mark, we have not heard.

New License By-Law.

This very splendid production was passed by the Town Council, on Monday evening. The price of license is, for a saloon, tavern, or hotel, $70 a-year; for beer-house, eating-house or ordinary, $20; for shop license where not less than a quart is sold, and then not drank on the premises, $60; for a billiard table, $20; bowling alley, $10; for a temperance house, $10. Before a licence can issue, for an hotel, tavern, or saloon, the consent of the owner of the house must be first obtained, agreeing thereto; and a certificate from three freeholders or householders of the Ward, as to the character of applicant, and the public necessity for the establishment. No drinking allowed after 11 p. m., until sunrise next morning; and no drinking between Saturday night and Monday morning. This arrangement will be rather inconvenient on occasion of public dinners; but since certain enthusiasts are bent upon reforming the world by a by-law, the experiment must be tried. It will not last long, the thing is too absurd; it does not follow because a man arrives at his hotel at 11.05 p. m., and asks for a drink, that therefore he means to get drunk. If such persons would look after their own morals first, their interference with other people's would be more tolerable; but the man who brought in this by-law is not in a position to preach morality. His officiousness is disgusting. He does not seem to understand his position in this community, since he gave his evidence before the Court of Chancery.

Parties applying for licence, to be joined by two good and sufficient securities, to be approved by the "Board of Inspectors," in a bond of two hundred Pounds, for the due observance of the obligations, thereunder the By-law. This is a beautiful arrangement. First, the applicant gets a certificate establishing his character; then he is to be treated as a rogue and vagabond, and made to find unreasonable security for good behavior. Such a requirement could only proceed from the assumption that his business was likely to prove a nuisance; whereas his certificate establishes that the public convenience will be promoted. Two Inspectors, at $60 a-year each are appointed, because two applied; one, under the surname of the Mayor; the other under the ring of Mr. Cooper. The public pay for the accommodation.

Many persons, not subscribers to this paper, have been disappointed and grieved o copy of Mr. Cooper's letter, to complete only the sentence in Chancery. Both documents are republished in this issue.

Baptist Sabbath School Anniversary.

Our friends of the Baptist Church in Peterboro', held their usual Sabbath School Anniversary on Thursday last. The Chapel which was tastefully decorated with evergreens was well filled with a respectable audience. After prayer by the Rev. J. Cameron, pastor of the Church, the was served, and the abundant variety of "good things" reflected great credit on them who supplied them. The Chair was taken by W. Hall, Esq. After some appropriate remarks by the chairman, the report of the School for the past year was read by the superintendent, Mr. D. McDonald, which showed it to be at present in an encouraging and prosperous condition. After some interesting pieces were repeated by a number of the scholars, very suitable addresses were delivered by the Rev. Messrs. Lloyd, of Port Hope, and Roberts, Blain and Scott. The Choir, under the superintendance of Mr. H. Graham did much to enliven the exercises of the evening. Altogether the meeting seemed to give general satisfaction, and we think all went away feeling a deeper interest in the very important work of training the young in religious knowledge.

Opening of Imperial Parliament.

On Thursday, her Majesty the Queen opened parliament in person. The doors were opened at noon, and several peeresses were in their seats before one o'clock. Shortly after that hour the foreign ambassadors and ministers, and other great officers of state entered the house.

A regiment of foot guards was stationed opposite the entrance of the House of Lords with their state band; and the horse guards lined the road from Buckingham-palace to the houses of parliament.

Her Majesty and his royal highness the Prince Consort, attended by the master of the horse and the mistress of the robes, left Buckingham-palace shortly before two o'clock in the state carriage, and proceeded through the park to the House of Lords.

Owing to the fineness of the day a very large crowd was drawn together to witness the procession. The whole of the windows whence a view could be obtained were crowded with well-dressed ladies. On her Majesty arriving at the House it was immediately announced by a discharge of cannon, the trumpets sounded, and the procession entered the house, led by the heralds in their state tabards; the yeomen of the guard lining the avenues. Then followed the Lord Chancellor, the great officers of state, &c. Her Majesty proceeded to the throne, and took her seat, all the peers and peeresses rising, but taking their seats on her Majesty's command.

The Lord Chancellor then delivered the royal speech to her Majesty, who commanded the Commons to be sent for. They immediately appeared at the bar, headed by the Speaker attired in his state robes, when her Majesty with her usual distinctness, read the following speech:—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,—In receiving, at the usual season, to the advice of my Parliament, I am happy to think that in the internal state of the country there is nothing to excite disquietude, and much to call for satisfaction and thankfulness.—Pauperism and crime have considerably diminished during the past year; and a spirit of general contentment prevails.

"The blessing of the Almighty on the valour of my troops in India, and on the skill of their commanders, has enabled me to inflict signal chastisement upon those who are still in arms against my authority, wherever they have ventured to encounter my forces: and I trust that at no distant period I may be able to announce to you the complete pacification of that great empire, and to devote my attention to the improvements of its condition, and to the obliteration of all traces of the present unhappy conflict.

"On assuming by your advice, the direct government of that portion of my dominions I deemed it proper to make known by proclamation the principles by which it was my intention to be guided, and the clemency which I was disposed to show towards those who might have been seduced into revolt, but who might be willing to return to their allegiance. I have directed that a copy of the proclamation should be laid before you.

"I receive from all foreign powers assurances of their friendly feelings. To cultivate and confirm those feelings, to maintain inviolate the faith of public treaties, and to contribute so far as my influence can extend, to the preservation of the general peace, are the objects of my unceasing solicitude.

"I have concluded with the sovereigns who were parties to the treaty of Paris of 1856, a convention relative to the organization of the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia. Those Roman provinces are now proceeding to establish, under its provisions, their new form of government.

"A treaty of commerce which I have concluded with the Emperor of Russia, and which will be laid before you, is a satisfactory indication of the complete re-establishment of those amicable relations which, until their late unfortunate interruption, had long subsisted between us, to the mutual advantage of our respective dominions.

"The measures which, in concert with my ally the Emperor of the French, I thought it necessary to take upon the coast of China, have resulted in a treaty, by which further effusion of blood has been prevented and which holds out the prospect of greatly-increased intercourse with that extensive and densely-peopled empire.

"Another treaty, into which I have entered with the Emperor of Japan, opens a fresh field for commercial enterprise in a populous and highly civilized country, which has hitherto been jealously guarded against the intrusion of foreigners. As soon as the ratifications of these treaties, shall have been exchanged, they will be laid before you.

"I have great satisfaction in announcing to you that the Emperor of the French has abolished a system of negro emigration from the east coast of Africa, against which an unavoidable feeling, however guarded, in the commencement of the direct trade, my government has never ceased to address to his imperial majesty in eight successive, but friendly, representations.

"This wise act on the part of his imperial majesty believes me to hope that negotiations, now in progress at Paris, may lead to the total abandonment of the system and to the substitution of a duly regulated supply of the unfortunately free labour.

"The state of the republic of Mexico, distracted by civil war, has hitherto led to every forbearance to its unjust faults, in regard to outrage and indignities to which British residents have been subjected at or the hands of the two contending parties. They have at length made a peaceful appeal to reason, which I have been compelled to give instructions to the commander of my naval forces in Mexican waters, and I consider it necessary to enforce due reparation.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,—I have ordered that the estimates for the ensuing year shall be submitted to you. They have been framed with a due regard to economy, and to the efficiency of the public service.

"The universal introduction of steam power into naval warfare will render necessary a temporary increase of expenditure in providing for the reconstruction of the British navy; but I am persuaded you will cheerfully vote whatever sums you may find to be requisite for an object of such vital importance as the maintenance of the maritime power of the country.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,—Your labours have in recent sessions, been usefully directed to various measures of legal and social improvement. In the belief that measures of a similar character may be wisely and beneficially introduced, I have desired that bills may be submitted to you without delay for consolidating and amending the laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency; for bringing together into one act of statutes, in a simplified form and with such modifications as experience will suggest to you, the laws relating to crimes and offences in England and Ireland; for enabling the owners of land in England to obtain for themselves an indefeasible title to their estates and interests, and for registering such titles with simplicity and security.

"Your attention will be called to the state of the laws which regulate the representation of the people in parliament, and I cannot doubt but that you will give to this great subject a degree of calm and impartial consideration, proportioned to the magnitude of the interests involved in the result of your discussions.

"These and other propositions for the amendment of the laws, which will be brought under your notice as the progress of public business may permit, I commend to the exercise of your deliberate judgment; and I earnestly pray that your counsels may be so guided as to ensure the stability of the throne, the maintainance and improvement of our institutions, and the general welfare and happiness of my people."

At the close of the speech the royal procession was reformed and returned to Buckingham-palace.

The Lords afterwards stood adjourned until five o'clock.

Lord Brougham on the War Crisis.

At a recent meeting of Parliament Lord Brougham spoke as follows:

He heartily agreed with his noble friend opposite, that, in the present critical state of affairs in Europe, it was of the utmost importance that there should be no difference between the government and those on the other side of the House, but that their lordships should, with one heart and one voice, concur in the principles which had that night been laid down. Having lately come from France, it might be necessary that he should state his entire adoption of those principles, lest his silence should be misconstructed—not in France, where there was the most entire unanimity of opinion among all ranks and all classes—(hear, hear) but in Sardinia, where it might be supposed that he did not share the opinions which had been so generally expressed, more especially as the course he took upon a former occasion in the other house of Parliament had already been referred to. It was then his fortune to land on the attack which was made upon the Holy Allies, as they were called, for intermeddling in the government of foreign countries; and he had been asked how he, who complained of the three gentlemen of Verona,—Prussia, Austria, and Russia—for having undertaken to put down the constitution in Spain, could abstain from objecting to the proceedings of Austria in Italy, and especially to the thraldom in which she was said to hold the Lombards. His answer was short and clear. The objection taken to the proceedings of the Holy Allies was aggravated, no doubt, by the circumstance that they were endeavoring to pull down a free, constitution in Spain; but the gravamen of the charge against them was their interfering in foreign affairs at all—(hear, hear,)—their undertaking to perform the duties of the police of Europe; and if, by the of those accidents or inconsistencies to which despotism was subject, it had happened that they had interposed to support a free constitution against tyrannical rulers, the argument would have been precisely the same. They had no right even for that good cause, to interfere with the affairs of another State. He would put a case which applied to the present subject. Suppose the Holy Alliance, instead of attacking the constitution of Spain, had thought fit to support the Genoese against Sardinia, the object of those who attacked them would have been precisely the same. They would have said that they were sorry that the Genoese were subject to the Sardinians, but that that was the result of the treaty arrangements of the Congress of Vienna in 1815, and that in the very fit language of her Majesty's speech, "the faith of treaties must be maintained inviolate," and that, under the false pretext of supporting the liberties of the Genoese, the Holy Allies had no right to interfere with the arrangements of the Vienna treaty. Now, it must be observed, that with all that was said against the Holy Allies they had at least no interest in the proceedings which they undertook. It was not with any view to their own aggrandizement or to the increase of their territories that they interfered. It was in order to put down, upon principles which were false and ever to be reprobated, the constitution of Spain; but at least, it was not for their own aggrandizement that they undertook that task. He wished he could say the same with respect to Sardinia at the present moment. The pretence was to favour the oppressed Italians, but we feared that under that pretext lurked no small disposition to enlarge the territories of the Sardinian Kingdom. No one could rejoice more heartily than he did at the establishment of a free constitution in Piedmont; no one could more admire the conduct of those who, in spite of many obstacles, maintained that constitution; and it was with a grief which he shared with his noble friend behind and his noble friend opposite, that he saw the departure from the sound honorable, and straightforward principles which had heretofore regulated the conduct of the Sardinian Government. He hoped and trusted that the universal reprobation, or, if that were too strong a term, universal sorrow which was felt at their departure from a sound and righteous policy would cause them to think twice, and more than twice, before they persisted in it. With respect to France, the whole interest, differing as it did most essentially from its position forty years ago, when it had no resources, no manufactures no description of capital, no railways, no commercial speculation, either of home or foreign trade—the universal feeling of all classes and all parties against any breach of the peace; and the universal good faith of the French government, of which we had recently had so signal proof in the passing of the Address and the Budget, left no room to fear that the French would, for the sake of any petty object, disturb the peace of Europe. He was sure that the noble lord opposite would, on reflection, see that the time was not one for a war between Sardinia and Austria could long be confined to Lombardy.—Sooner or later it must end in a general European war. Such a calamity as that it really frightened one to contemplate, and he heartily joined with his noble friend who had addressed their lordships in expressing a sanguine hope that no such misfortune would befall us. [Hear, hear.]

TERMS OF THE
MONTREAL WITNESS
FOR 1859.

SEMI-WEEKLY EDITION,
TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM.

WEEKLY EDITION
2 dollars per single copy, per annum.
4 " for clubs of 4 addressed separately.
20 " for 20 copies to one address.

When a club has been formed, additions may be made at the same rate.

Any one remitting ten subscriptions for either or both editions, will receive a copy of the semi-weekly gratis, except in a case of 20 copies to one address.

The terms for both editions are strictly cash in advance, and the paper is invariably stops when the time contained for expires.

The Witness has from the beginning been much indebted for whatever success it has attained, to the kind efforts of friends all over the country in its behalf, and is in no case more so ever dependent on their voluntary agency.

As advertisements, not at variance with the character of the paper, will be inserted in the semi-weekly at 7 cents per line for first insertion, and 2 cents for each subsequent insertion; in the weekly, the charge will be 20 cents per line for each insertion.

Every family should take a city paper in addition to the local newspaper. The latter is necessarily, on account of the local intelligence it gives, whilst the former is valuable for its general information.

LENOARD SCOTT & Co's.
REPRINT OF THE BRITISH REVIEWS, AND BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

L. SCOTT & Co., NEW YORK, continue to publish the following leading British Periodicals, viz.:

1.
THE LONDON QUARTERLY (Conservative).
2.
THE EDINBURGH REVIEW (Whig).
3.
THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW (Free Church).
4.
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW (Liberal).
5.
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE (Tory).

These Periodicals ably represent the three great political parties of Great Britain—Whig, Tory, and Radical,—but politics forms only one feature of their character. As Organs of the most profound writers on Science, Literature, Morality, and religion, they stand, as they ever have stood, unrivalled in the world of letters, being considered indispensable to the scholar and the professional man, while to the intelligent reader of every class they furnish a more correct and satisfactory record of the current literature of the day, throughout the world, than can be possibly obtained from any other source.

EARLY COPIES.

The receipt of Advance Sheets from the British publishers gives additional value to these Reprints, inasmuch as they can now be placed in the hands of subscribers about as soon as the original editions.

TERMS.

	Per ann.
For any one of the four Reviews	$3 00
For any two of the four Reviews	5 00
For any three of the four Reviews	7 00
For all four of the Reviews	8 00
For Blackwood's Magazine	3 00
For Blackwood and one Review	5 00
For Blackwood and two Reviews	7 00
For Blackwood and three Reviews	9 00
For Blackwood and the four Reviews	10 00

Money current in the State where issued will be received at par.

CLUBBING.

A discount of twenty-five per cent. from the above price will be allowed to Clubs ordering four or more copies of any one or more of the above works. Thus: Four copies of Blackwood, or of one Review, will be sent to one address for $9; four copies of the four Reviews and Blackwood for $30; and so on.

POSTAGE.

Subscribers in the British Provinces will receive the Reprints free of U. S. postage.

N. B. The price in Great Britain of the five Periodicals above named is $31 per annum.

Our Reprints versus Eclectics, &c.

As we have for many years been paying more than $3,000 annually to the British Publishers for the matter furnished in these Periodicals, thus virtually becoming co-partners with them in the profits of the Reprints, we trust the public will consider this in bestowing their patronage, and give us the preference over Eclectic and other patchwork publications, whether monthly or weekly, which now extract so liberally from our works and pay nothing either to the Foreign Publishers or to us for the same. As to cheapness nobody can complain of paying $10 a year for the four leading British Reviews and Blackwood's Magazine, by taking these works entire subscribers are not obliged to be guided by others in the choice of the articles they may desire to read. Moreover taking into consideration the style in which our Reprints are published and their acknowledged fidelity to the original editions, and also to the advantage of an early issue by means of the advance Sheets—our series will be found as cheap as any one of the competing publications to which we have alluded.

The State of Europe.

THE STATE OF EUROPE JUDGED BY M. GUIZOT.

(From the Journal des Debats.)

The organs of public opinion should not forget that they are not only responsible for what they say, but for what they suppress; and that this silence is a heavy responsibility when it might have been useful or possible to break it. If we could for a moment believe that we were interdicted from expressing the public sentiment upon the serious question of foreign policy which just now pre-occupies all the world, this forced silence would afflict our patriotism, but it could not wound our honour, and we should consider ourselves freed from a duty impossible to fulfil. But we do not think it so; we are persuaded, on the contrary, that no one can with displeasure see us obey our conscience in telling the truth upon a question which affects the greatest interests of France.

We do not accuse the French Government of wishing for war, still less of seeking it, and we believe its denial upon this point to be very sincere; but we fear it may one day find itself engaged therein without desiring it. We see that some journals are prodigal of baneful counsels, and try to make the government partake of their illusions. They represent the deliverance of Italy a task as easy as it would be incontestably glorious; they show beyond the Alps an ally whose power they overrate; they show another beyond the Vistula whose sincerity they guarantee; and, to complete the description, they paint the rest of Europe as pacifically disposed, while fully armed, to look upon the dismemberment of the empire of Austria with a mixture of secret satisfaction and selfish terror. We are certain that the French Government, at least as well instructed on the state of Europe as the enlightened public, is proof against these gross allurements, and, as a pledge of this, we have its pacific assurances, recently given to us. The Government knows that they wish to deceive it in representing Austria as a contemptible adversary; it knows also that they seek to mislead it in deluding it with the neutrality of Germany. If necessary to take sides, the Germanic Confederation, without doubt, will choose Prussia as a guide; and the inaction of Prussia is much less certain than they affect to believe. No one is ignorant that the advent of the liberal party in the Government of that country, and the establishment of the regency of the Prince of Prussia, have not had the effect of separating Austria and Prussia. Quite the contrary, for not only have this party and its leaders a vivid sentiment of the military honor of their country, but they are also notoriously penetrated with those ideas on the union and solidity of the whole of Germany, of which the Assembly of Frankfort was the instructive but impotent organ. When lately an Austrian journal invoked the support of Prussia in the name of all Germany, representing the common country as equally well defended on the banks of the Po and the borders of the Rhine, who will guarantee for us that these words had not an echo in the heart of Prussia, and did not answer to its strongest passions? But her interests as well as her passions, her alliances and her interests, impel her to this side. It is no mystery that the marriage of the Prince of Prussia with the eldest daughter of Queen Victoria has only been the sign of reconciliation between the two countries at the moment when England found herself conforming in opinion with Austria upon so many contested points of the treaty of Paris. It is in this, however, that those who wish to drag the French Government in their train triumph; and, with an incomprehensible security to those who see clearly, they cry out that they are assured of the neutrality of England. Is it not, in the first place, a singular presumption to be assured of anything in regard to a country whose affairs are not in the hands of any one and the conduct of which is changed at will? One may, however, predict, rather let us say it is easy to see that the mood of the English public does not justify this confidence in her neutrality. Habituated for a long time in making vows for the liberation of Italy, in cursing the Government of the Pope and the King of Naples and criticizing Austria, the English public have been surprised to find a question which they considered far off dropped suddenly upon them. It has appeared to hesitate a moment between its avowed sympathy for Italy and their great anxiety for the equilibrium of Europe, which is the invariable foundation of English policy. But not more than eight days were necessary to show those who know the English public to which side it inclined; and, in supposing matters to be more advanced than they really are, the Government, sufficiently warned, has more time than necessary to form its plan, and decide England to follow it. Without saying more, we think ourselves able to affirm that those who promise English neutrality to the French Government are deceiving it, or are themselves deceived. Russia then remains whose concurrence is boasted of as certain and irresistible. We do not, without extreme distrust hear it said that Russia—so rudely tried by the last war, so pledged to industrial enterprises which require time and peace, so distracted especially by domestic reforms which resemble a revolution—shows at this moment any eagerness to stir up a general war. We would more willingly believe in her neutrality than her co-operation. But would this concurrence even be a sufficient compensation for the non-concurrence, and, in this case, certain dissensions of Germany and England? And is it a very engaging prospective to show us one half of Europe in arms against each other? We believe that Russia holds to peace more than to thought; such words as say, but agree strongly than almost entire Europe, which, in taking war, would believe itself to be pushing to a social necessity.—And, since these who so blindly push on France to undertake the war allow that she will be dismembered, adding to these fears the absolute certainty, we must confess that the whole of Europe has conspired as one, and nothing to gain in this great trial. A single doubt in the completion of this rule, and may think that it has some interest in unsheathing the sword. This doubt may think that it has everything to gain in a war since it may come out from it prodigiously aggrandized; it might flatter itself with having nothing to lose, as, in any case.—Europe would not permit it to be sensibly diminished. If conquered by its own hands or by our, never will there have been for a little State a more fruitful victory; if it should lose its new battle of Novare, it may hope to be free from a war contribution, and the Powers which would have seen its defeat with pleasure, would not suffer it's existence to be endangered, nor its future too seriously compromised. Can as much be said for the generous ally who would have sheared its fortune? Piedmont, which has never concealed its desire to drag us along with it, forms natural and ill disguised vows for war.

This avowed disposition, joined to the means of action which it possesses in Upper Italy, and to the hopes it has there excited appears just now to be the greatest danger which menaces the peace of Europe. The belligerent party of Piedmont finds natural support in our country among these Utopians, unbridled partizans of universal peace which they are always ready to break up by a general war; among the insupportable artizans of our future regeneration; among all those, in short who believe themselves interested, for a crowd of good and bad reasons, in the bouleversement of Europe.—Thence springs the concert of noise, excitement and false rumors; thence those fine promises of alliances or neutrality, which have for their object but to seduce the French Government, at least to compromise it, and to represent it as too far advanced to withdraw without embarrassment. This is the whole policy of the enemies of peace; it is not very profound, but it would not be the first time that improvidence and audacity, aided by change, shall have decided the fate of peoples. For ourselves, we have faith in the pacific declarations of the French Government. We are convinced that it will not give ear to those who wish to drive it into a blind lane, to choose between the ensir of its own honour or that of the national interest. We are certain that it will not allow the fortune of France to be jeopardied in the hands of short sighted agitators. Whatever may happen, we do our duty to the Government and the public in telling the truth. If we yielded to the narrow spirit of party, of which we are sometimes accused, we should hold another language, or rather, we should keep silence we have loved better to speak as becomes intelligent and sincere men, who in this crisis wish to show themselves faithful interpreters of public opinion and devoted friends to their country. We need not add that if our hopes be deceived, and if we must submit to this trial, we who have never hidden our sympathy for Italy, we will follow without an afterthought, and to the end the banner of France, while making vows, as all good Frenchmen then should do, for victory and peace.

The Sinews of War.

In these days, battles must be fought on 'Change, before they can shake hill and valley with the murderous thunder. Ambitious despots, strong in bayonets, must still bend the neck to the chaffering Jew. What saith his majesty King Rothschild—shall it be peace or war? Here is the question to be answered: the question in comparison with which, the gloom or gladness of Napoleon's mood are insignificant gossip. Not upon the "awful hook" of an iron duke is the world suspended, but upon the arched bridge of the rich Israelite.

In the midst of the rumours of war which have lately disturbed Europe, thousands of sagacious "practical" men have emphatically declared that bloodshed was an impossibility just now—a luxury beyond the means of bankrupt France and Austria. Let them squabble, said these "practical" men: let them count their soldiers, but where are the sinews of war?

Where are the sinews of war with which Theophilus Jones, the spendthrift, goes to the Derby; gives dinners at which "G. H. M." might sit without being disgusted; keeps hunters; and risks his hundreds at loo? He knows that his fortune is gone; that his father is implacable; that his rich aunt has shut her doors upon him. Still he races, and dines and plays! For, are there not the Jews? It is merely a question of per centage. In his palmy days Theophilus borrowed at some five per cent; well, now he contracts debts at forty. Theophilus will dine, and race and play until he has reached cent per cent. Then for rackets on the Surrey side of the river, and a sermon from a commissioner of insolvency.

Now Theophilus is only a mean copy of the Emperor of Austria. The moneylenders by whom Theophilus is supported are simply shabby shadows of the great house of Rothschild. Some time since Austria borrowed a million or two, taking ninety pounds for one hundred pounds; now Hapsburg—his credit being a little threadbare—will borrow some six millions sterling, taking eighty pounds for one hundred pounds. He must have money, and he borrows it at the price his money-lenders ask for it.

We have now, in the London money-market, a proposition made by Messrs. Rothschild for the loan of six millions of English money to Austria. Austria owes already two hundred millions sterling, and her revenue is only twenty-eight millions; but she can borrow, or the cotton forsaken would not have undertaken the present business. We entreat our readers to examine carefully the position of borrower, and lender, and agent. The borrower is threatened by France and Sardinia; and we may add, by Russia. Austria's iron rule in Italy has, at length, estranged the peace of Europe. Her brutal banishment have disorganized the Roman States, and lead northern Italy with a vengeance that cannot be longer considered as tributaries. The cry of oppressed Italy has given an excuse for war to the Queen of France and to the ambitious head of [illegible] neighbours. The avenging sword is at Austria's throat; and she turns to England to give the sinews of war to her armed hosts. She speaks in our market-place through a member of the English House of Commons.—Through that same member who, during the Crimean war, had the effrontery to help the enemy of his adopted country. Through that same member whose house has sucked the life-blood of Spain, has realized millions from the craving necessities of a misgoverned people.

To be neutral is one thing, but to abet and sustain the wrong side is another. Unquestionably, England should hold aloof from the designs of France and Sardinia, while they appear to be mainly influenced by personal ambition. It is when the time comes for the settlement of the Italian question, that English influence would be used with salutary effect. When the question arises—shall the Lombardo-Venetian Provinces be erected into a kingdom for Prince Napoleon, or be added to the dominions of Victor Emmanuel? But English troops could not appear on the continent without widening at once the circle of the struggle. We could afford only a few regiments; our physical help, therefore, would be of little avail to the cause of freedom. On the other hand, by remaining neutral, by keeping ourselves strong and prosperous, we might, the war at an end, speak with high authority to the conquerors. They would be exhausted—and our support would be of the first importance to them. Then our voice might be raised in the cause of freedom, and to the confusion of those ideas of family aggrandizement, which, it is our firm belief, dominate the mind of Louis Napoleon.

But shall we, in the outset, strengthen the hated Austrian? Shall we give anew to the arm that every lover of freedom should help to unnerve? When a money-leader, who sits in our House of Commons, in the greedy pursuit of per centages, endeavours to drain six millions of English money into the Hapsburg bankrupt treasury, shall we not speak loudly against this shameful bargain?

Let the reader mark the cunning with which the money-lender plays his game.—On the 7th of this month Louis Napoleon is to speak to his legislative marionettes on his plans and wishes. The money-lender will have his money before the imperial mouth is opened—before the oracle sounds the command for battle. Therefore subscribers to Austria's loan must pay their money by eleven o'clock on the important 7th. Let Louis Napoleon then clatter about Italian independence to his enslaver nation as he lists; Austria will have the gold that shall make her bold for the onslaught. In this way speaks Baron Rothschild—liberal member for the City of London. And still men will see in the millionaire something to worship; in the soulless loan-contractor, an English representative man.

For ourselves we see in the baron an agent ready to arm Austria, that she may still oppress Italy. The money-lender, who has no higher principle than the production of per centages, is not likely to be scrupulous. If he would lend to the Austrian—the foe of Italian freedom—why should he refuse the means to build a fortilla at Cherbourg?

In the one case the money is intended to stifle liberty in the south of Europe; in the other it would serve to raise the shrine of the world's freedom. Well, profit, not honour, is the game of the Rothschilds; and we applaud the pursuit of profit, for we keep a Rothschild in the English House of Commons.—London Times.

The Age of British Statesmen.

(From the London Spectator.)

"Are there any young men in public life in England?" asks our contemporary. It is a question not without interest, and it seems of peculiar import at the present time. The subject is started by turning over the leaves of that useful little book, "Who's Who?"—a sort of address-card case for everybody. In spite of one's personal knowledge, which might suggest the fact, it almost surprises one to find that all our eminent politicians are men advanced in life. For instance, Gladstone and Disraeli are still called rising men,—men of great "promise,"—and Disraeli especially is thought by certain solemn red-tapists to have attained his present post by rare luck and improper rapidity. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a middle-aged gentleman of fifty-three, and Mr. Gladstone is only four years younger. Mr. Disraeli also has been twenty-one years in Parliament, and Mr. Gladstone has been eighteen years a Privy Councillor. Amongst all the Privy Councillors of the Queen there is not a man under thirty; and there are seven men under forty, (for we exclude the Duke of Cambridge, who attained the rank by birth.) If we call forty "middle-aged" we should then find of the two hundred and thirty-one right honorable gentlemen all but eight are above the middle term of life,—all but eight grave and reverend seigniors. The eight youngest Councillors are not all of that volatile and juvenile turn which might be expected. Lord Stanley is the very youngest Councillor of the Queen; the public regard him, however, as a man more grave, more solid than his father, and he has the heaviest responsibility of any member of the Cabinet.

Young Cabinet Ministers are very rare; excluding Lord Stanley, there was Lord John Manners, who joined the Cabinet at thirty-four, the Duke of Newcastle at forty-three, and Mr. Sidney Herbert at forty. These three are our youngest public men of Cabinet rank; but in that rank, though not in connection with home office, is Lord Dalhousie (who was Cabinet Minister at thirty-one, and is now only forty-three), and Lord Canning, who is only forty-six. At the other end of the illustrious roll-call we find that the Queen's oldest Councillor is the Marquis of Lansdowne, who was called to the Privy Council in 1806 (the year Pitt died), and the next is Lord Palmerston, who this year completes half-a-century in the Councils of the Sovereign. The oldest man in the Privy Council is Lord Lyndhurst. Reading the political controversies of last year, we also find that against no man were there so many charges of "levity," "indiscretion", "flippancy," as against the late Premier—all but one, her Majesty's most veteran adviser. Are all our old men young, and all our young men old? Mr. Disraeli, in one of the fiercest debates of 1852, appealed to "the generous and the young at both sides of the House.' In the present Parliament, the young men under thirty are but a minority of fifty; of that fifty there are many who at present give public promise of politicial eminence. Amongst the few are Lord Bury, the Honourable George Byng, Sir John Ramsden, Lord Ingestre, the Honourable W. F. Denison, and Lord Robert Cecil. Even if we add the Honourable Wilbraham Egerton and Lord Raynham, there are but eight rising young men in a House of 658. This gives point to the complaint that the large boroughs send us too many middle-aged mayors and manufacturers. . . .

When Talleyrand heard talk around him of Young Italy, Young France, Young England, he said, "What! are we to have governments of bibs and tuckers?" But we more nearly realize the appreciation of one of the leading counsel in "The Clandestine Marriage" who, hearing that a junior is forty, says, "I wish you success, young gentleman." All our young men are forty.

OYSTERS; HOW TO RAISE THEM.—The Paris Correspondent of the Boston Traveller sends for the delectation of cis-Atlantic oyster eaters, the intelligence that M. Corte, the well known naturalist, has addressed an interesting report to the government on the oyster fishery, and the best manner of increasing the supply of this valuable shell-fish. The government ordered him to stock Saint Brieuc Bay with oysters. "I have brought to Paris," says he, "one of the apparatus for the collection of oyster fray (the germ of the oyster) with specimens taken from every bank. The young oysters which cover it are already one-ninth of an inch thick. In eighteen months they will be ready for market.—There are 20,000 oysters on a single apparatus, which is no larger than a wheat sheaf; these 20,000 oysters will fetch, when ready for market, 4000f. This crop will be inexhaustible, because as many apparatus may be immerged as the government pleases, and each adult furnishes between two and three millions of embryo oysters. M. Coste intends covering 36,000 acres with oyster beds in three years; the expenses will be only 10,000f. a-year. He declares the experiment made in Saint Brieuc Bay conclusively proves that wherever the bottom of the sea be not liable to the deposits of mud, industry guided by science, may farm out the bottom of seas fertilised by its care, more abundant harvests than the earth affords. I therefore propose stocking the whole Atlantic and Mediterranean coast of France, the whole Mediterranean coast of Algeria and Carnicia, and the salt-ponds of the South of France."

Marriage Ceremonies in England and Ireland.

DISGRACEFUL SCENE AT A WEDDING.

On Sunday morning a very disgraceful scene presented itself at the parish church Southover, at the conclusion of a marriage ceremony. Three couples, connected with the working classes, presented themselves about ten o'clock, in order to be united in wedlock, but the clergyman did not arrive till half-past ten, at which time the bells commenced ringing for the morning service, and the congregation began to arrive. It appears that one or more of the contracting parties had rendered themselves obnoxious to the popular feeling by a case of decided jilting, and this feeling was manifested in a shameful and irreverent manner. The matrimonial service was being conducted while the bells were ringing, and this in itself caused some confusion, but the confusion rose to complete disorder—if not to an actual riot—by the conduct of some persons in the church. In the sacred building were placed loaves of bread to be given away to some of the poorer parishioners, according to ancient custom. Some of these loaves were broken up, and the pieces thrown at the newly-wedded couples as they were about to leave the church. On coming out they found a large mob collected outside, who assailed them with tufts of grass, cabbage-leaves and sprigs of ivy, torn from the venerable walls for that purpose. These disagreeable missiles followed them for a considerable distance past the Crescent, towards the residences of the married pairs. One of the bridegrooms—who with himself and bride had been the most vigorously assailed—turned to remonstrate with the riotous crowd who were following them, and while holding them thus for a short time in check, his bride made the best of her way home, following, in this respect, the example of the other two couples who had preceded them. It is satisfactory to know that no personal injury resulted from this most disgraceful proceeding, but the garments of the assailed parties—particularly those of the two who seemed to be the most obnoxious to the mob—suffered damage. We refrain from giving the names of the parties concerned in an affair which has scandalized the whole parish, as it will probably be investigated before the proper authorities.

STARTLING NUPTIAL DESCRIPTION.

The other day, a farmer named Quigley, residing in Kilcommon, in the King's County, was married, and after returning from the marriage feast, at an early hour in the morning, to his house, accompanied by the bride, his friend came of his farmhouse assembled, and a soldier attended to his head decoration, intimating that the nearest visitors would be the ruin of him, married or single? Not a very pleasant welcome. It is said that the bridegroom was almost boldly married to a young woman in the neighborhood, whom he obtained for a larger fortune, which has increased her friends, who have instituted such a rather peculiar method of proclaim. The fellow ope-

BANISHMENT OF THE EX-KING OF DELHI TO RANGOON.

The ex-King of Delhi has been banished to Rangoon, whence he will be sent to Tenasserim, a station 300 miles in the interior, in the vicinity of the Karen territory, and believed to be the most desolate and dreary in British Burmah. It seems that the Indian Government fully intended to have sent the old fellow to the Cape of Good Hope; but the colonists positively refused, on principle, to allow any state prisoner to be landed there, declaring that they did not care whether the convict was a king or a cooke. The ex-King and suite landed at Rangoon on the 9th of December. He is represented as being a sallow, miserable, decrepit wretch, entirely devoid of the majesty and dignity of exterior of an Indian prince. He was landed in one of the steamer's boats in charge of a lieutenant, and after being assisted up the steps of the quay by a couple of sailors was placed in a hack carriage. The two sons, equally devoid of anything striking, or even respectable in appearance, and dressed in plain ordinary clothes, as generally worn by native menials, accompanied their father in the same conveyance. The females, muffled up in the coarsest quilts, were not visible; their little delicate feet however, peeped out from slippers that had seen the light of other days. The whole party took their seats in hired conveyances and were taken to the main guard in the cantonments by a file of European soldiers under the command of Lieutenant Osmon who is in political charge of the royal cortege. During the voyage in the steamer Megara, Jumna, the "interesting youth," and the only one of the family not a condemned convict, occupied his time on board in squabbling with his mother, who accused him of purloining the family jewels. On one occasion this scion of royalty got very drunk, and was assured that if he repeated this sort of amusement he would be provided with a separate cabin, and nourished with bread and water for a while.—The youngest son, who is about 15 years of age, seemed to be a favourite among the crew, who gave him every indulgence, and by their freaks caused a good deal of merriment.

DEATH OF THE KING OF AVA — ALLEGED DECLARATION OF WAR AGAINST GREAT BRITAIN.

Intimation has been received in Bombay of the death of the King of Ava, and that his successor has declared war against the British nation. The first part of this intelligence is probably true, but the latter is more than doubtful, and may have originated in the fact that the heir to the throne was at the head of the old war party.

The Rebellion in India.

THE SIEGE OF MUJIDIAH—CAPTURE OF THE POST—LAMENTABLE ACCIDENT TO LORD CLYDE.

By the arrival of the Bombay mail we have received our private correspondence and files of papers from Bombay to the 10th of January. The Begum of Oude sent in on the 21st December to Lord Clyde, or rather to Major Barrow, the political agent, to sue for surrender. But the suit was not followed by the act; and it was discovered late on the 21st of December, that the rebels had evacuated the intrenchments of Nanparah, taking the Begum, a prisoner as it were, among them. There was nothing for it but to proceed with the reduction of the districts.

THE MARVELLOUS ESCAPE OF TANTIA TOPEE.

Tantia Topee and Feroze Shah are both aware of the terms of the amnesty, yet neither of them are inclined to surrender. On the contrary, they have effected their junction on the Chumbul, north-east of Kotah, and are rapidly marching with hostile intent to Madhorajpore, whence they threaten Jeapore. That Tantia should, in a fortnight, have been able to baffle five or six columns thrown out in pursuit of him, and march from the vicinity of Oodeypore to the neighbourhood of Jeypore, is one of the startling proofs of the rapidity with which native marauders can march, and shows that the old Pindarries survive in full vigor.—Nor was this prodigious feat of locomotion performed in a direct line. It was accomplished by a variety of zig zag movements, which had been rendered absolutely necessary by obstacles which arose on every side. On the 19th, as you were informed by my last letter, Tantia was at Durriabad, in the vicinity of Pertaubghur, manœuvring to pass into Kotah. The line of road at right angles north of the Chumbul was watched by several columns echeloned between Rutlam and Neemuch. Tantia Topee first endeavoured to break through in a Northerly direction, and he marched to Bhindur. Major Rocke's Neemuch column headed him there, and he withdrew. A little to his right lay the Sindree Pass. He tried to break through there, but Somerset's force was at hand, and he retired again. On the 24th he reappeared near Pertaubghur and made a desperate effort to pass. Rocke's column, however had made forced marches after him and occupied the road, so that an action was inevitable. Unfortunately, Tantia was misinformed as to our force, and thought he had only to deal with a detachment of cavalry. I say unfortunately, because had he known that the whole of Major Rocke's column composed of infantry, cavalry, and part of Boulton's battery, was at hand, he would have hastened in attempting to force his way through the pass leading from Pertaubhur, above Mundesaure, to the Chumbul and the chance would have remained to us of hemming him in and encircling his ill-disciplined army. Tantia, however, fancying he had to deal only with the cavalry, entered the passage on the 24th, and was totally surprised by Rocke's force, whose artillery, under Captain Bolton, opened upon him at short range with considerable effect. Tantia did not attempt to resist. He fled, and leaving some men and elephants in our hands, swept by our force and rapidly proceeded to the eastward. It was now the turn of Col. Somerset to pursue. He despatched Col. Benson with the 17th Lancers. Tantia did not relax for a moment in his efforts to fly. He got to the Chumbul, crossed it before his pursuers and, still running east, Zeerapore, in the territory of Holkar, 100 miles south east of Neemuch, on the 26th of December. Col. Benson followed him almost as rapidly as he fled, caught him at Zeerapore, after a forced march, and fought another action, in which the rebels lost more men and elephants. Still Tantia escaped and fled. He now abandoned his easterly course, and retired rapidly to the northward. On the 1st January Colonel Somerset had again caught him at Barauda, or Jharred, near the Chumbul, some 60 miles north-east of Cotah. This feat was performed by a forced march of five days, without tents, and with very little food.—Col. Somerset's strength was, however, too numerically weak to do more than disperse the rebels. His force consisted only of two companies of the 52d, under Captain Bottone, four guns Royal Horse Artillery under Paget, 150 of Beeva's Camel Corps, and a part of the 6th Bengal Native Infantry, under Capt. C. E. Bingh. Had the detachment been three times as large the rebels would have been destroyed to a man.

In a pursuit, in the course of which the Horse Artillery getting rather wild, Lord Clyde put spurs to his favourite charger to bring him to some sort of order. In doing this his Lordship's horse came down and threw Lord Clyde heavily to the ground, dislocating his shoulder and hurting his face. He rose instantly, but the accident was evidently severe. Dr. Gordon and Mr. Maclennon were close at hand, and the limb was restored to its place in two minutes; but the shock was very great, and Lord Clyde was unable to resume his seat. The pursuit continued, notwithstanding this unfortunate event but Gen. Mansfield told it to pursue, and he shared the rebels with his cavalry and infantry for four miles, when they got into jungles and darkness ended it.—One of the guns taken was a nine pounder. On the 28th, Lord Clyde, leading the division, marched on two columns, seven miles, and came before the fort of Mundisher, or rather stronger position than any thus the rebels had found in Oude. It was girt by a deep dry ditch, flanked, and crowned capable of withstanding sudden assaults. Lord Clyde, however, after reducing it to its present strength, and causing the Rebels to be invited to a parley between two commissioners out of the direct line of fire, determined to take the place from three sides.

Provincial Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

THURSDAY March 3.

VACANT JUDGESHIP.

Hon. Mr. DORION begged to call the attention of the House to a matter of great importance. In the session of 1857, a law was passed to amend the judicature acts of Lower Canada. That law provided for certain changes in the constitutions of the Court of Queen's Bench. The number of judges was to be altered from 4 to 5, and the quorum from 3 to 4. Since that time the appointment of the 5th judge had never been made in order to constitute a Court of Appeal. The consequence was, that a great number of cases remained undecided, there being a difference of opinion between the four judges. In the Superior Court a vacancy occurred through the death of one of the judges, and although six months have elapsed, the vacancy has not been filled up, in consequence of which there was almost a total cessation of the administration of justice in Lower Canada. In fact, from information he received since he gave notice of his motion, it appeared that the term of the 1st of March had fallen through for want of a quorum. He thought it was the duty of the Government, whenever a law was passed, to put it into execution without the least delay if possible. It was the dereliction of duty on the part of the Government not to execute the law by appointing Commissioners to codify the laws which was passed in the same session. We have been told that within a year or two we should have a new code of laws. Well the Commissioners were only appointed a few weeks before the opening of the present session. Mr. Dorion then went on to say that the Court of Queen's Bench was so far disorganized as to lead to a total failure of the administration of Justice in that Court, not from any want of desire to administer justice on the part of judges, but because they found that under the present law they were incompetent to decide cases on account of there not being a quorum to do so. He then referred to the district of Ottawa, being some 250 miles in length, where a vacancy occurred some five or six months ago, and which had not been filled up.—Was it impossible to find a judge. Or did the Government hold appointments over the session in order to secure votes. (Hear, hear.) He considered it to be a complete dereliction on the part of the Government, to leave the district of Ottawa without a resident judge for five or six months. He hoped, therefore, that the motion he was about to make, would be supported by the whole House. The non-appointment of judges to fill the vacancies who just now were severely felt that at any other time, because one of the judges of the Superior Court had been ill for the last eighteen months and almost always absent from his duties. In consequence of this the judges of Montreal had been obliged to go from one district to another [illegible] all duties to be performed in Three Rivers, Montreal and Ottawa districts, all during the month of March. It was quite impossible that they could do all in the time. It was impossible that they could be in all the courts at the same time. The consequence was that a great number of cases were left undecided, and the whole judiciary of the Province would have to shrug up their shoulders in commiseration of them. (Great laughter.) If the fact was as stated by the hon. gentleman, it only showed the necessity of having a fifth judge appointed.

Mr. DORION—That is precisely my object. Why was not a fifth judge appointed.

Atty. Gen. CARTIER—Well, I will come to that point. He might inform the House that the appointment of a fifth judge was at present under consideration by His Excellency, as also the appointment of a Judge at Ottawa. There were to admit, [illegible] to the one—(laughter) but certainly not those which the hon. gentleman has had the generosity to allude to. In charity, he supposed it had been wanted that these appointments were held up by the Government as baits to influence the votes of some hon members of the House. Well then he hoped that these hon. gentlemen would show their consistency by voting against the motion. They would thereby prove that they repudiated the declaration that the members who supported the Government were actuated by such base feelings and motives. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) He (Mr. Cartier) had no hesitation in saying that if the judges made use of such language—if they decided the other day that they could not sit in the Court of Appeal because one of their colleagues had been appointed to assist in the codification of the laws of Lower Canada—they had committed an error in law. (Hear, hear) But he knew them too well to be induced to believe that they ever uttered such words. If, however, it did turn out that they had used such language, he (Mr. Cartier had the very dishes distributed over and always to be found at executions. The drenching rain of the previous day and night, combined with the trampling of feet, had occasioned a complete slough in the vicinity of the gallows' platform, and numbers of the people who had come there had their position in front of an early hour, and remained there till late in the forenoon.

At about half-past 7 o'clock, O'Leary's sister was permitted to see him, although it was thought that Thursday's visit was her last, but the unhappy girl would not be contented unless she again cast her eyes on her unfortunate brother. The interview was painfully affecting. They threw themselves into each other's arms. His sister's distress deeply moved the heart of O'Leary. He cried bitterly, and deplored his unhappy fate. The Rev. gentleman again prayed with the culprit, until about half-past 9, when the executioner made his appearance to perform the task of pinioning. He bore the trying operation with great fortitude, after which, at the earnest solicitation of his sister, she was again admitted to the cell. She was now more composed, and prayed with her brother, after which they took leave of each other for ever in this world. She then left the prison; but shortly afterwards returned to the door, crying bitterly.

Fleming also underwent the ordeal of pinioning with much firmness.

HOW THE CONVICTS SPENT THE NIGHT.

To all appearance the wretched men passed the midnight hours—their last on earth—in a composed and tranquil state of mind. Fleming was attended throughout the night, by Mr. Davey and others, with whom, until four o'clock, he engaged in fervent prayer. He then expressed a wish to rest himself for a while, and having thrown himself upon the bed, the gentlemen left him. He slept peaceably until half-past 5, when he again awoke and once more received the consolations of religion. Shortly before 8 o'clock he was visited by the Rev. Mr. Marling, who remained with him until he had done with everything pertaining to this world.

The other culprit, O'Leary, sat up throughout the night. At ten o'clock he asked for a light, saying that he could not sleep, and he continued in silent meditation and prayer until about half-past 6 in the morning, when Father Rooney was admitted into his cell, and the rev. gentleman attended him in his last moments.

THE EXECUTION.

Soon after 8 o'clock, the Sheriff and Deputy Sheriff arrived at the gaol, and the next hour-and-a-half was occupied in making the remaining preparations for the execution. Mr. Jarvis mounted the scaffold in order to see that all was secure; the ropes were brought; firmly knotted and hung athwart the beam, much, as it would seem, to the gratification of the crowd without, as testified by the noise they made. Several gentlemen, who ventured to show their heads above the wall, learned conclusively that their personal appearance was by no means such as to prevent the possibility of their being mistaken for criminals of the worst kind.

As the morning wore on, the clouds became a little less threatening, and the sun breaking through the gloom, banished for a while the thought of rain; a few minutes before ten o'clock, however, a heavy shower fell, but it lasted only a few moments. The time fixed for the execution of the condemned men was between eight and ten o'clock, but Mr. Jarvis determined to give them as long to live as possible, it was not until a quarter to ten o'clock that they were led out to execution. Fleming, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Marling and Mr. Davey, walked first, followed by O'Leary, attended by the Rev. Mr. Rooney and the officers of the law. The countenances of the prisoners appeared frightfully pale, but they walked with firm steps to the scaffold. Fleming mounted first and without hesitation; but when O'Leary came to the ladder, he manifested a slight reluctance which was however but momentary, and he then steadily ascended to the fatal drop.

On reaching the summit, the miserable felons were conducted to the places assigned them under the beam—Fleming being on the north, and O'Leary on the south side. The clergymen stationed themselves by the side of the culprits; the hangman being close at hand. This little functionary was dressed in light clothing, and wore a large mask. It is stated that he was committed to gaol a short time ago on a charge of disorderly conduct. He will receive about $90 for his unenviable work.

Father Rooney then addressed O'Leary, and said:—John O'Leary, do you wish to say anything before undergoing the punishment of the law?

O'Leary replied by reading to the crowd, in a loud, firm tone of voice, a written statement, which was in effect as follows: My dear friends,—The report having gone abroad in the newspapers that I have not expressed contrition for my sins, and that I have made no confession, I beg leave to contradict it before you all. From my inmost heart I do feel contrition for all my sins, and particularly for the crime for which I am now about to offer my life, and for which I would resign a thousand lives if I had them. For what is this life to the life in the world to come? I also tell you, my dear friends, that I have made my confession with, I hope, as good a disposition as I was capable of, so far as human being could do. And I would not at this moment change my position for that of the Queen of England, because I feel confident that I am prepared—I hope—to meet my Creator with a clear conscience. Therefore I trust in His mercies, as I will participate in His glories before the setting of this day's sun. I humbly beg, therefore, my dear friends, that you will pray to the Lord that He may have mercy on my soul!

To this request the spectators with one voice responded—"Amen."

Father Rooney then dropped down and made an act of contrition.

O'Leary did so, and on being asked if he wished to say anything more, he replied that he did not.

Father Rooney—Are you satisfied with the efforts made for you by your friends?

O'Leary—I am. The wretched man said the priest then knelt in prayer, whilst the executioner adjusted the rope. That had been done, the culprit said—I forgive every body in this world, and I hope the Lord will forgive every one of us. My dear friends, pray, I beseech you, that the Lord may have mercy on my soul!

The people manifested a response to this petition, and a woman in the crowd exclaimed,—"May the Lord in Heaven have mercy on his soul!"

The executioner and Father Rooney prayed together until the fatal bolt was drawn.

In the meantime, Fleming knelt in silent prayer with the Rev. Mr. Marling, who had performed the same kind office which he had discharged in the case of his unfortunate companion. Fleming until the executioner adjusted the rope. That had been done, the culprit said—I forgive every body in this world, and I hope the Lord will forgive every one of us. My dear friends, pray, I beseech you, that the Lord may have mercy on my soul!

—"Politics" [illegible] their eyes!" The executioner did so. After the [illegible] beverage Hall clock) at that instant pealed forth the hour of 10. The Sheriff gave the preconcerted signal—the bolt was withdrawn—the bodies fell with a dull, heavy sound, which sent a shudder through all who heard it—there were a few struggles—and all was over; the wretched men had paid the penalty of their crimes.

The bodies remained suspended for a little over half an hour, and were then lowered, placed in plain coffins, and removed to the hospital within the prison. A post mortem examination was afterwards made by Drs. Richardson and Bethune, when it was found that the necks of both men were broken. The appearance of the bodies evidently showed that both of them must have expired instantly. The brain of each was weighed, when that of O'Leary was found to be 3 lbs, and that of Fleming 3 lb 4 oz. The body of O'Leary was claimed by and handed over to his brother-and-law and sister in the afternoon, and conveyed from the prison in a hearse. That of Fleming not being claimed by his father, Rev. Mr. Marling took charge of the body, so that it might receive decent burial, at the request of a number of those who had interested themselves in behalf of the unfortunate youth during his life. The remains was removed to the Necropolis in the afternoon.

Fortunately, executions are not of frequent occurrence in Canada; and this being the case, it was feared by many that some accident might happen through a want of experience. The fear was groundless; all the arrangements being as complete as if the officers of the law were thoroughly au fait in such matters.

OUTSIDE THE GAOL.

The crowd outside the jail had appeared a good deal excited as the hour approached, and every part of the work on the scaffold was watched with great interest. The placing of the cross beam, and more especially the attaching of the ropes, created quite a sensation; the length of the drop soliciting much remark. At this stage of the proceedings, some unseemly conduct took place among the multitude, every one being anxious to secure the best place to view the awful tragedy about to be enacted. Pushing, and crowding, and hooting was the result. Many, who had taken their stand on waggons and on large piles of stones near the scaffold, were, by the swaying of the crowd, forced from their stations, when down they fell amid the mud, giving on such occasion the signal for a cheer, and a loud burst of laughter. The most noticeable fact outside, perhaps, was the large number of females present. Old women with their gray hairs, mothers with babes in their arms, young women and girls, all were represented. As usual a great number of those who are known as "unfortunates" were present, but hundreds were to be seen who certainly belong to a better class of society. So far as the male portion was concerned, the merchant and laborer competed for the best place to get a sight of the grim preparations, while the light-fingered gentry were as usual moving about, attempting to ply their vocation even here—beneath the gallows. It did not transpire whether they were successful to any extent in their nefarious attempts, but it appeared from their movements that they were on the alert. The detectives being about in plain clothes, no doubt had a salutary effect.

Immediately after the unfortunate men had been hustled into eternity, the greater portion of the vast multitude quietly dispersed. Many however, lingered to see the bodies cut down and the scaffold removed.

About thirty of the new police were present at the scene, under the charge of the three sergeants major, to preserve order.

THE CHURCH STREET MURDER.

It appears likely that Fleming knew something of the death of Cunningham, who it will be remembered, was found shot in an alley leading from Church-street some months ago. He stated to the Rev. Mr. Marling that William McKay (of the young Canadian saloon) and Cunningham, had early in the evening, been drinking at the Peru saloon; the latter having in his possession some fifteen or sixteen dollars. McKay with others, stopped at the Peru until near midnight. Cunningham left some hours previously, and was not seen again until met by Fleming and McKay as they were proceeding down Colborne-street home when they found him staggering along the side-walk, evidently intoxicated. McKay offered him assistance, and leaving Fleming alone, the pair passed on to the alley where the body of Cunningham was afterwards found. They had not long been absent when Fleming heard a shot fired; and McKay immediately afterwards made his appearance, running at a rapid pace. Fleming asked what was the matter, but was told with an oath, it was none of his business. This statement was communicated to the Police Magistrate, and also to the Attorney General, both of whom pointed out that it was perfectly valueless, as there was no witness to corroborate the story. It is not altogether improbable that the prisoner thought by making some statement of this kind, that the Executive might be induced to reprieve him, at least for a time. If so, the result has proved he was wrong in his calculations.

STATEMENT OF FLEMING.

The subjoining letters, containing an account of Fleming's life, and his religious sentiments and feelings, were written by him in his cell, according to their respective dates; and, by his own request, are now published:

TORONTO, February 24, 1859.

My short experience of the consolation of true religion, and the workings of the Spirit of God on the human heart, is briefly this:—Since my arrest, I have read the Bible over twice. I was fully convinced by the grace of God, of the errors of the religion in which I was brought up. What few doubts remain on my mind were removed by the kind instructions of Mr. Stewart, (city missionary,) who has been visiting me for some time. Mr. Davy, (Wesleyan city missionary also, has administered religious consolation. I feel now that I am a different person in every respect, to what I was when in the world. I see things in this world in a different light to what I formerly did. I see that this life is but a resting place, to prepare us for a better and more glorious world, where we shall live for ever. Therefore if we but serve God here on earth, the short time we have to stay here. I feel that our Lord Jesus Christ died for sinners, and that by his blood alone I can be saved from everlasting destruction. I forgive my persecutors freely, as I hope to be forgiven. I feel I have been a great sinner, and do not deserve to be among the blest; but still I hope that the Lord God will show mercy even unto me, if I but trust in his all-merciful power. I feel there is no medium anywhere where the Spirit of God's grace is. Even in this cell I feel calmer than at first, and feel perfectly prepared to say fate which it may please God to bestow upon me.

JAMES FLEMING.

TORONTO, March 2nd, 1859.

I was born in Galway, in Ireland, of Roman Catholic parents. I was christened in a common school in Ireland, and in a Jesuit School in Toronto. I was brought up a Roman Catholic. I left Ireland about 1850, and came to New York and Toronto. I left school at 15 years of age, and went in the capacity of a "messenger boy" in the Grand Trunk Telegraph Office, Toronto. I was shortly promoted from "messenger boy" to that of attending the battery, and from that to "assistant bookkeeper." I had about this time learned to operate, and was then promoted to the capacity of assistant telegraph operator.—About this time I had commenced reading novels and bad books, and going to theatres; also indulging sometimes in taking a little liquor. I have never been really intoxicated in my life more than three or four times. I am now fully convinced that these along with getting into bad company, have brought about my ruin. I would here advise all young men that carrying deadly weapons will be their ruin, as it has been mine. Take my advice, as one at the point of death, and do not indulge in any of the above-mentioned practices, as you value your life or liberty. After my arrest, I bless God that I ever saw Mr. James Davy, who gave me good advice and religious instruction. The first time he came to the gaol while I was there, he called me to him,—while I was leaning against one of the pillars, smoking and chatting to the prisoners—and advised me to repent my sins, and make my peace with God. I answered him evasively, not exactly understanding the plan of salvation at the time. I noticed him at my trial, sitting a short distance from me, and was happy to see him. The next visit I had from him was a few days after the trial. I now began to see my full necessity of repentance, while convinced by the Spirit of God or sin, righteousness, and of the judgment to come. I commenced to pray and ask mercy from God. Mr. Davy continued visiting me, and on February 11th, while he and Mr. Wallis were reading the Scripture and praying with me, I was unable to roll my guilty soul upon Christ as the Saviour of mankind. When I got off my knees in the cell I was enabled to say that God, for Christ's sake, had pardoned all my sins; and I told them and the turnkey, that I was not afraid to die that moment. I have been endeavoring from that time to the present to believe in Christ, to the salvation of my soul. I also have to tell you that I feel earnestly for O'Leary who is in the next cell to me, and have prayed to God to have mercy upon him and save him. The few hours that I have to live, I am trying to look to God for a deeper baptism of the Holy Ghost. Oh, that He may grant it to me for his name' sake! I sincerely hope that Mr. Davy and I shall meet each other in the kingdom of heaven.

JAMES FLEMING.

STATEMENT BY WILLIAM HUGHEY.

The man whom I murdered first came to my house as a boarder, and after some time living with me obtained such power and influence in the family, that his word was sooner obeyed than my own. Intimacy having arisen between him and my wife which I thought too familiar, I ordered him to depart, which he failed to obey. I was accustomed to drink occasionally. I have led a very sinful and wicked life.—About nine years ago, I became the subject of religious impressions, and experienced a change of heart, which lasted for three years. This change was brought about at Lore's Wesleyan Methodist Meeting House, King, Canada West. During this time I met in class, but on moving to Whitchurch, I discontinued it; and from this period of my life I date my backsliding from God. After this I indulged in liquor more freely than before, and in some measure discontinued attending public worship. The man Ramsay and my wife used to walk out together frequently: but nothithstanding this I never suspected that anything was wrong till I was informed of it by my children. About harvest 1858, I reproved my wife for her conduct towards Ramsay, but abuse and misconduct were the result. A "chopping bee" was held at our house the day previous to that on which the fatal act was committed, but Ramsay was not there till the evening, when whiskey was freely used by nearly all, I myself becoming intoxicated to unconsciousness. The whiskey was brought by Ramsay and my son in the afternoon. No ill feeling preceptibly existed among any of the company throughout the evening. A little before dawn on the following day (the day of the murder) I retired for a while to rest, and after rising, again asked for whiskey, which I then drank and seeing it was done, desired to go four miles to Mitchell's Corners to buy more, but having no money, and my relative not supplying me with it, I was compelled to desist from drinking. My mind excited by drink and jealousy, was everything but in a proper frame. Ramsay at this time was cutting shingles. I was doing nothing. I know nothing of taking the axe, nor have I any recollection of striking the man.—After the blow had been given, my wife screamed loudly, which brought me too a little. Ramsay walked across the room to the bed, where he laid himself. I then retired and rested myself for a little while, during which time the doctor arrived. I then felt conscious I had done the deed; but I am convinced I did not do it with any intent to kill him. The act was committed at nine in the morning, and after dark I was arrested. Ramsay lived till half-past four P. M. I was immediately committed to Toronto gaol. After my trial, Mr. Davey, Wesleyan City Missionary, visited me, and faithfully spoke to me about my soul. I was hard, but at and after prayer, weeping was mixed with misery. The second visit he brought me a Testament and a pair of spectacles. I immediately read the Word of God, and the Spirit of God revealed to me that I was a vile and miserable sinner. On Friday, 11th February, Mr. Davey and Mr. Wallis were present, and during their stay I was enabled to cast my all upon the atonement of Christ, then and there realizing I was a sinner saved by grace divine. I still feel happy in the love of God, and now experienced such a change as must be felt by the soul, it being beyond description. I am prepared for the worst, God is my help and support. I am determined to cling to Christ, and show by my walk and conversation that I am born from above. I look for down the dismal of sinners, that I may be kept. I would humbly return my sincere and heartfelt thanks to His Excellency the Governor-General and his advisers, for the clemency with which they have been pleased to favour me in my awful extremity. I also [illegible] for getting up a petition in my behalf. The Lord reward them abundantly for their kindness.

To the truth of God I owe my conversion to my brother, Mr. James Davey's instrumentality, and bless God that ever he was constrained to publish to me the good news of salvation through Christ Jesus.

[illegible] having requested me before my execution, some of whom are now witnesses to these [illegible] I pray God to bless all, every one, amongst his

The Examiner.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10th, 1859.

There is little of interest in the Parliamentary debates this week. Mr. Inspector General Galt's tariff meets with much opposition. It would be rather difficult to suit every class of traders and consumers in the matter of imposition of duties. We are not inclined to scrutinize over closely. The difficulties of his position ought to be taken into account. Mr. Galt, in our opinion, is neither a truckler, nor a fool, and therefore he claims respect.

Mr. MOWAT has introduced into the House of Assembly, a measure to remove the necessity of empanelling Juries to try undefended issues. It will not pass the House. There is quite too much new legislation. Such changes should not be made until the country feels the pressing inconvenience of existing forms.

Little Lake Cemetery.

The proprietors of the Little Lake Cemetery are anxious to know, for what reason no meeting was called by the Secretary, in last January, as by law required, for the purpose of electing officers. There must now be a considerable amount of funds on hand and it interests them to know that they are not applied to the uses of any other parties than the company. The Secretary is paid for his services, why does he neglect to perform them? If there is no opportunity given to the proprietors to investigate the affairs of the Company; it will then be necessary for a meeting of interested parties, when such steps will be taken as may not redound to the credit of the present officers. There must have been some motive for concealment, and that motive may have been the very prevalent one at this time of misappropriation of funds. We trust that the parties indicated will take an early opportunity to assert their innocence.

Confirmation in St. Peter's Church.

His Lordship, the Bishop of Kingston, accompanied by the very reverend the Vicar-General McDonnell, has been, for some days, the guest of the reverend Mr. Kelly. On Sunday, his lordship confirmed a large number of young persons, in St. Peter's Church, when the vicar-general delivered a most excellent sermon, the Church being filled to overflowing, and the congregation composed in part of the members of other Churches. Before the ceremony of confirmation the bishop addressed the congregation in a most earnest manner, upon the subject of their religious duties, and congratulated the young persons before the altar, upon the gift they were about to receive. The organ was played in great perfection, and the choir performed its part admirably. The strangers were accomodated with seats, in the kindest possible manner, the proper owners submitting to stand, while their friends were seated.

Sheriff Hall has dismissed his deputy Gallon, who had grown too big for his boots.

The convicts Fleming and O'Leary were hung in Toronto on Friday last. The full account is in another part of this paper.—Hughey passes the remainder of his life in the Provincial Penitentiary.

There has been no publicity given to the finding of the Coroner's jury in the instance of the blowing up of the boiler at Peplow's mill. People would like to know what they thought of the crazy old thing. It was sold the other day, and no doubt will be put in complete order again to take more lives. Mr. Clanton is understood to be the purchaser. It is to be hoped he will not risk his own valuable person in attending it.

The Court of Quarter Sessions and County Court were opened on Tuesday last. Little was done the first day. There is a good deal of business for the County Court.

Arrival of the "Jura."

NEW YORK, March 7.

The steamer steamship Jura, from Liverpool on Friday the 18th ult., arrived this morning.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The affairs of the Ionian Islands claimed attention in the House of Lords on Thursday night. In the Commons, Mr. Liddell took his seat for Galway, and Mr. Sidebottom for Chesterfield. The Bank Charter Act [illegible] Mr. Gilpin gave notice of a resolution prohibiting the employment of prisoners in the manufacture of [illegible] the prohibition [illegible] the British and Austrian governments for the employment of a telegraph to Montpelier had been agreed upon. The terms involved a guarantee, but not an immediate [illegible] Lucca was given to Mr. Ayrton to bring in a bill to remove many of the legal distinctions between newspapers and other publications.

FRANCE.

The La Presse had received a warning for an article of the same paper as it had been publishing [illegible]. The general supposition [illegible] was taken on the representations of the Austrian embassador. The [illegible] on the Bourse; rentes advanced a half per cent, but the rise was not fully sustained. The closing quotations were 68f. for money, and 67f. 70c. for account.

The late disastrous failures at Odessa are said to extend to twelve millions of francs.

M. De Lesseps left Paris on the 15th ult., for Alexandria, for the express purpose of commencing the Suez Canal.

SARDINIA.

The Paris correspondent of the Times asserts on trustworthy ground, that the King of Sardinia is determined on making an attempt to drive out the Austrians, with the object of constituting for himself a kingdom strong enough to resist Austria on one hand, and France on the other if need be, and that it will comprise Venice, and at least 12 millions subjects. An absolute certainty is felt at the Court of Turin, that France will help Piedmont against Austria, and that Russia will be with her passively if Austria is left to fight alone, but actively and openly if any other power assists Austria. England and Prussia are expected to be neutral.

The above is asserted to be the deliberate plan of the King of Sardinia and his cabinet, and nothing but the withdrawal of France will divert them from it.

TURKEY.

The news from the Danubian Principalities is considered of a serious character, and it is feared that complications may arise in that quarter which may be more difficult to deal with than the affairs of Italy.

The new Hospodar Cousea had made his entry into Bucharest. He had issued an edict decreeing the union of the Principalities, with one national assembly.

A fresh despatch of troops was expected at Constantinople.

SWITZERLAND.

Great agitation existed in the canton of Ticeno on the occasion of the elections and at Surgano a riot had taken place, in which several persons were wounded and one killed.

INDIA.

The Bombay mail of January 25th was telegraphed. The campaign in Oude had ended on January 9th. Two leaders had surrendered. The Begum with some followers had fled into Nepaul. Nana Sahib was supposed to be with them. Lord Clyde was on his way to Lucknow. All the forts had been destroyed, and 400,000 stand of arms had been surrendered.

The Murree tribes were causing trouble on the Scinde frontier.

Reform Meeting in Edinburgh.

A public meeting "of the inhabitants of Edinburgh and its vicinity" was held in Dunedin Hall on Tuesday night, "to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament in favour of an extensive measure of reform, based on the principles explained by Mr. Bright, M. P. and embodied in the resolutions published by him." On the platform were Bailie Russell, Bailie Grieve, Mr. Caird, M. P. Mr. Tait of Priorbank, Mr. Duncan McLaren, Capt. Peat, &c. &c.

Bailie RUSSELL, who was called to the chair, stated the object of the meeting, and expressed his thorough approval of Mr. Bright's scheme of reform, the leading point of which he briefly referred to.

Mr. DUNCAN McLAREN moved the first resolution, in favour of "Extending the franchise in burghs to all male householders and occupiers of other premises rated for the support of the poor, who have resided for twelve months within any burgh, and who have paid the poor's rate chargeable against them." It had been charged against Mr. Bright that at Rochdale he had given up the plan which he enunciated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Bradford. At Edinburgh, he explained his plan of the franchise very minutely; and he (Mr. McLaren) made a statistical statement as to the effect which the plan would have in Edinburgh, Mr. Bright having both before and after the meeting seen and discussed the figures which he gave, and been satisfied with them. In Edinburgh he had shown that the effect would be to double the number of electors. In Glasgow Mr. Bright referred to his (Mr. McLaren's) statistics as containing his plan, while he also said that the effect in Glasgow would be to add a considerably larger number to the constituency. This guess was proved to be correct by Dr. Strang's statistics of Glasgow, just published, which showed that the present number of electors on the roll in that city was 16,000, Now, if they took a ratepaying franchise, which Mr. Bright announced as his plan in Edinburgh, and which he repeated at Glasgow and at Rochdale, Dr. Strang showed that the ratepaying franchise in Glasgow would produce 46,500 voters, thus increasing the number two-and-a-half fold; showing that Mr. Bright knew what he was speaking of when he said in Glasgow that his plan would more than double the number of electors there, and when he said at Rochdale that he did not care whether household suffrage was adopted or not, because it came near the same thing, for Dr. Strang showed that household suffrage would produce 36,200 electors. Now there were 100,000 men in Glasgow of twenty-one years of age and upwards, and when it was considered that all that Mr. Bright's franchise would do, would be to put 40,000 of them on the roll, including the 16,000 on the roll already, he was surprised at the moderation and good feeling and good sense of the working classes. Some of the newspapers which attacked Mr. Bright said he was for universal suffrage, and that he advocated that every bodman and every man who lived in a low lodging-house was entitled to a vote. But was there no difference between universal suffrage, and the enfranchisement of 40,000 out of 100,000 men in Glasgow? (Cheers.) It just came to this, that out of every five men in Glasgow it was proposed to put ten on the roll, and keep three off it, those put on the roll being the richest men; and yet there were men who called this universal suffrage. Mr. McLaren thus alluded to the advantages of a rating franchise as compared with a sum of £10, or £5, or any other sum, because of its flexibility. Referring next to the representation of the counties, Mr. McLaren maintained that the mere population of the counties was no test of the number of members which the counties should have, unless the landowners extended the franchise there as in boroughs. If he (Mr. McLaren) had his will in preparing a reform bill, in place of giving to the counties twenty-six men, as Mr. Bright had done, he would not give them a single member. (Cheers.)

Mr. FLEMING, a working man, seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. CAIRD, M.P. who was received with great cheering, said,—Having been invited to attend this meeting I gladly accepted the invitation to lend such aid as I could to the movement, in the capital of my native country, in favour of Parliamentary Reform.—When a boy at the High School, I was present at the meetings in the King's Park, in favour of the first Reform Bill, 28 years ago. I heard Francis Jeffrey, from the Hustings in the High Street, returning thanks to the electors for his success, when that Bill had become law, and I am sorry not to see in this movement the successors of that party who were helped to power by the aid of the working classes, and refuse to help them now. (Loud cheers.) It is needless to waste time by enumerating the defects of the first Reform Bill. They have long been admitted, but the period has at length arrived when all parties acknowledge that further reform is necessary. No one hesitates now about the propriety of a further extension of the suffrage. (Hear, hear.) The increasing intelligence, loyalty, and good order of the British people entitle them, in the consideration of thinking men of all parties, to a larger share in the privileges of electors. An outcry has been raised against Mr. Bright that his principle is an attempt unduly to increase the power of the towns at the expense of the country. Is this the fact? We have at present 441 burgh members. Mr Bright proposes to take away 96 of them, and add them to the Counties. Now, from the time of Charles the Second down to the first Reformed Parliament, the number of members for cities and burghs in England was 418, and only 94 for counties. The House of Commons was the people's House, and was then in the early history of the country so recognised, the great landed proprietors having a character to themselves in the House of Lords. The Reform Bill increased the county representation, but still left it at 159 to 327, or less than one-half that of the burghs. Mr. Bright proposes still further the English burgh representation to 301, and increases the county members from 159 to 177, and yet he is accused of unfairness to the landed interest. (Hear, hear.) The great bulk of the land has a potent voice in the Legislature through the House of Lords, who, besides the power of their own chamber, exercise an immense influence in the House of the People. Every sixth man in the Commons is a Lord or a Lord's son. (Laughter, and cries of "Shame.") We don't object to that if they are the free choices of the people. (Hear.) The young aristocracy as a class are at least as honest, as intelligent, and as independent as any other class from whom the representatives of the people are selected; and it is a great advantage both to themselves and their country, that the best of our young nobles should enter on public life, after having earned by their merit a seat in the Lower House as the representatives of some independent body of their fellow countrymen. (Hear, hear.) But let them repeat that what Mr. Bright proposes is not to diminish the county members, but to increase them; not to increase the borough members, but to diminish them; and yet he is accused of unfairness towards the country party, though he actually adds nearly a tenth to their numbers. (Loud cheers.) I call it the House of the People. Who are the People? At the time of the first Reform Bill, when the present proportion of town and country members was fixed, one-third of the whole adult population of England was engaged in, or dependent upon, the cultivation of land.—At each census since that time that proportion has diminished. At the census of 1851 not one-sixth of the adult population was occupied in agriculture; and if, as I have no doubt it is, the same change is still going on, there is probably not at this moment more than one-tenth of the adult population of this island in any way dependent on the soil for their employment. This seems to me a fact of great importance which the British people should not lose sight of.—(Hear, hear.) Are the interests, or the fancied interests, of one-tenth of the people to be made paramount to those of the other nine-tenths? (Loud cheers.) Do not let us, then, be misled by the cry of injustice to the country party. But to come home to ourselves. How will the principles Mr. Bright has announced affect Scotland? I say most fairly, as respects the number of members; and I beg your earnest attention to this. At the present moment, whether tested by population or taxes, it is indisputable that the Scotch towns have not their fair share of representatives. Each Scotch burgh member, on an average, represents 49,396 people, and £201,600 of real rent, while the English borough member, on an average, represents only 22,088 people, and £127,000 of real rent. (Hear, hear.)—Both in population and property the English have thus nearly two borough members for our one. Now, if separate Reform Bills are introduced for the two countries, and if the English Bill proceeds to re-distribute her present number of members irrespective of the equal claims of Scotland, we may nearly as well be without a Reform Bill.—(Hear, hear.) We pay the same taxes as England, bear our share of the same burdens, fight with her in the same ranks—and the efforts of all statesmen of late have been to assimilate as much as possible the laws of the two countries. If we are put on the same footing as England we shall have 17 additional members. Any bill that excludes us from that equal footing will be unfair to Scotland. Let Scotchmen remember this. The principle of Mr. Bright's scheme secures it for us, and if Scotchmen have the patriotism to pull together on this point, they may secure it. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Let us follow this a little farther. You understand the question of the 40s. franchise. It is right that you should know that many of your representatives do so too. For, though both the last and present Government combined against it, my motion in introducing the bill to give you the benefit of that franchise was declared by a majority of only one, when we count the Scotch members alone, 18 voted for it, and 19 voted against it. Now, what did we ask then? Simply to be placed on an equal footing with England—nothing more.—(Hear, hear.) We saw most glaringly before us in the Scotch counties, that popular representation was a farce; that there was not even the pretence of such a thing; and we found that, in England, they had a principle which gave some liberality to the popular element. It had acted well for 28 years. But the narrow, provincial spirit of our Scotch Governments, whether Whig or Tory, could not brook this popular element, and they refused to place their own countrymen, the intelligent Scotch artizans, on the same footing as those of England. (Loud cheers.) It was what the rest of the town-people enjoy. Mr. Bright says that the English agricultural labourer has never shown any interest in politics. This measure will not affect him as he is not a ratepayer. But the country tradesman, the country artizan, are as capable of exercising the franchise as men of the same class in towns. (Cheers.) And now I come to a subject of great importance. Are we to have the ballot? Without it, extension of the suffrage will be a half measure, in Scotch counties a sham. (Cheers.) People object to it, that secret voting is unmanly and un-English. Is coercion English or manly? If you give men the franchise honestly, your gift is nothing unless you secure to the voter its free use. We have tried open voting, and we know that men are coerced, are threatened, are frightened into voting against their convictions, and punished if they venture to vote honestly. Nor are such men always the poorest class of £10 voters. Well, we may regret the necessity, but there is a necessity, and the ballot is the only remedy against the abuse of power. (Great cheering.) It has succeeded in Australia, amongst citizens of our own country. I can offer myself as a witness of its working in America, for I was present in November last, at an election at Chicago, and nothing could exceed the perfect order and good feeling with which, in a very keen contest, the vote by ballot was carried on. (Hear.) The only danger I should apprehend from it, and that is one we can easily guard against, is the influence of a clique, if the many means were to be voted at once. For that reason all large constituencies should be divided, so that, if possible, not more than two members should be voted for by any elector. (Hear, hear.) There are some practical points in the working of any Reform Bill which ought not to be overlooked. The system should be such as, if possible, to admit of self-registration—so that neither candidate nor elector would be put to any expense for admission to the performance of a public duty. (Hear.) Then there ought to be a simpler mode of inquiry in cases of disputed elections. Nothing can be more unjust to remote constituencies in Scotland or Ireland than the present system. All the witnesses must be carried to London, whether 20 miles distant or 500 miles. Now, having gone through the points which we require in a Reform Bill, let us ask ourselves, "What do we hope to obtain by Reform?" Let us begin with the Crown. In the first Reform Bill one of the remedies sought was a diminution of the excessive power of the Crown in Parliament. That has been remedied, and no true man who hears me but will join with me in saying that the highest branch of the Constitution cannot now be improved. (Loud cheers.) The happy position has been gained as much by the personal character and wisdom of the Sovereign as by the constitutional safeguards by which she is surrounded. (Much cheering.) But the Crown is not only the most satisfactory of our institutions, it is also, you will be surprised to hear, by far the cheapest. If the Royal estates, which are the property of the Queen as much as are the estates of any private landowner, were well managed by the public, the Court of Queen Victoria would be self-supporting. (Cheers.) It is not the fault of her Majesty, but that of Parliament, that they are expensively managed; but even as it is the Royal property yields a nett surplus to the public which already goes far to balance the amount of the Civil List We come now to the second branch—the House of Lords. There can be no doubt of the great constitutional value of the Lords as a deliberative and independent chamber. But there is one grievance that ought to be remedied. The use of proxies is an insult to the common sense of the country. (Cheers.) That a vote should be permitted to be given in a deliberative assembly—when the voter may not only not have heard a word of the discussion, but even be thousands of miles away, is too absurd to admit of defence. It is a privilege which should be withdrawn. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) We come at last to the House of Commons. The first thing which must strike any man in considering this subject is the enormous revenue raised from the people to carry on the public establishments of the country. We want greater economy and efficiency, and we believe that both these ends may be obtained by a fairer system of taxation. (Hear, hear.) You don't assume the governing class of any intention to lay burdens on you that they may relieve themselves, but a system has grown up, I believe without any definite design, under which the great mass of taxation is levied on the consumption of the people. Look what an expensive system that is. It costs 7 per cent to raise it; actually more than two-thirds of the income-tax is spent in collecting the public revenue. There is positively four times more money paid to support the tax-gatherer than to educate the people.—(Hear, hear.) The value of property is constantly increasing. The more competition there is for it, the richer does its owner become. But exactly the contrary is the case of labour. The more the labourers increase, the more they compete with each other, and the less valuable is the individual labour. (Hear, hear.) You wish to impress this fact upon Parliament. You say to yourselves, "Here we are squeezed together—300 to a square mile—30 millions of people in these small islands. We have millions on millions of acres of good land in our colonies. Why does a parental Government not offer to her more helpless children the means of going to the colonies where their labour would enrich themselves, strengthen the colonies, and improve the condition of the labour market at home." With perfect fairness might this be said.—And sometimes it is done. After the Crimean war we found on our hands a German Legion, and in order to get respectably rid of them we carried them out to the Cape of Good Hope, paid every expense, and settled them free on Government land. Agricultural wages are falling again in the south of England to seven shillings a-week. Would it not be well to offer these labourers such an alternative as was given to the German Legion? (Cheers.) Then in regard to education. We have been going on without a plan, spending a good deal of money, and probably doing some good. If there is any duty more than another which a civilized nation owes to themselves, it is to educate the people. We cannot expect them to use their reason advantageously until enlightened by education. In this we are behind several nations on the Continent, and great though we may imagine our educational expenditure to be, you will probably be surprised to hear that the single State of Ohio, which in the beginning of this century was an untrodden wilderness, spends on public education in a single year, out of its taxes, a sum nearly as large as that granted by Parliament for the United Kingdom.—(Hear, hear.) We pay more than three millions a-year for courts of law and justice, and yet nobody gets law and justice for nothing. (Hear.) The public pay an average of £150 for law and justice in every parish of the kingdom, but they must pay their lawyer's bill besides if they venture to ask for justice. A cheaper transfer of land is wanted. (Hear.) The lawyers have surrounded this subject with technicalities that a man of humble means must pay enormously if he wishes to buy or sell real property. Our expenditure on law and justice don't help us here. And one useful and beneficial reduction of this class of expenditure in Scotland, which I pressed on them in 1857 and 1858, and which both Governments unanswerably to be proper, has been unhesitatingly pocketed. (Hear, hear.)—There are some of the reforms which you may hope to obtain by having a Parliament more thoroughly representing the interests and views of the labouring community. Now is your time for action. Show your earnestness in the cause. Demand a more thorough representation, and your cause is as just and reasonable that it cannot fail to be successful. (Loud and continued applause.)

Mr. WM. TAIT seconded the resolution, observing that he had no objection to the enfranchisement of the working classes.

The motion having been passed unanimously,

Mr. PETER HAYNE moved the next resolution, approving of Mr. Bright's plan for disfranchising certain boughs, and distributing a large proportion of the vacant seats equally amongst the most populous burghs in England, Scotland, and Ireland; and thanking Mr. Bright for his great exertions in making in the cause of real reform.

Mr. STUART then moved a resolution in favour of the Ballot, which was seconded by Mr. Cow, and agreed to.

Councillor FORD proposed the next resolution in favour of triennial Parliaments, which was seconded by Mr. Thomas KNOX, and agreed to.

Mr. GOSNIE, advocate, seconded the motion, which was carried.

On the motion of Mr. MACKNIGHT, advocate, seconded by Captain PEAT, it was resolved that a petition, embodying the resolutions passed at the meeting, be publicly exhibited for signature throughout the city, and afterwards forwarded to Mr. Caird for presentation in the House of Commons.

Letters from the Camp.

By the arrival of the Indian Mails, letters from head-quarters have come to hand. They range from December the 16th to the 23rd. We select the most interesting passages:—

COLUMN CAMP, SECRORA, Dec. 16.

Of actual operations I have to tell you since my last letter. We have marched nineteen miles a-day for nineteen days, and we are now in hopes of bringing the enemy to an action, for he is surrounded from Gorruckpore to Rohilcund by an arc whose chord is the Terai. The Begum is at Nanpárah with twelve or fourteen guns and 8,000 men, of whom 2,000 are cavalry.—To-day we marched about twelve miles from Secrora, and we hear that some of the enemy are at Buraech, which they plundered the night before last. The great event is the irruption of Feroze Shah across the Ganges and the Jumn. Of this full particulars will doubtless have reached England from Calcutta and Bombay.

MAUN SINGH, HIS BROTHER, AND THE GENERAL.

Before we approached our camping ground the clouds fell, and the rain poured down, to the evident discomfiture of the natives. It is strange that people supposed to such heavy falls of rain as the inhabitants of India should not prepare clothing better adapted to protect them. I could scarcely resist a smile at the appearance of Maun Singh as he rode ahead of us in a gay tiara or high cap of gold or silver brocade, kid gloves, a thin dressing gown, tight pantaloons, cotton socks, and slippers. His brother, Rugbeer Singh, magnificently dressed in the richest shawls and stuffs, is one whose appearance does not excite much mirth; it is easy to resist the inclination to laugh at a man whose deeds are of the most atrocious character, if the testimony of living and dead are to be credited. He is a Torquemada in the art of torturing, and he has done more than all that Colonel Sleeman records of him. In spite of his height, delicate hands and feet, and splendid attire, Rugbeer Singh has a repulsive look, for in his face there is a mingled expression of the slyness, cunning, and cruelty which are but too well evinced in his acts. The Rajah's general is a fine fat Hindoo, whose aspect does not justify one in supposing that he would be a very formidable strategical antagonist to Lord Clyde. He was well mounted, and I send something to that effect to the officer beside him, who translated the phrase to the general. He immediately salaamed, and said, "If the Sahib likes the horse, will he honour me by accepting it?"—a facon de parler which he would have been much disgusted to have found carried out literally and seriously.

THE CITY OF BURAECH.

The choke, or principal street, where the bazaar is held under the circumstances, half the sheds shut, the shops closed, and only the lower sort of traffic going on, looked very miserable, but it must have been mean enough at the best. It is narrow and dirty; the houses are one storey high, of mud and brick, with the squalid exception of ricketty two-storied edifices, of which, be it observed, the upper parts are all pierced with recent loopholes. Vain attempts have been made to conceal these hostile indications by filling the apertures with mud and plastering them over. The shops are open in front, windowless and doorless, like those of Turkey; but there was nothing to buy, except old sweetmeats, sugar, atta, gram, tobacco, and ill-conditioned vegetables, which the proprietors sold with fear and trembling to Oude police camp followers and fierce Baloochees, whose notions as to the course of trade very probably affected the prices materially. Few once known inhabited ten were empty; all the older buildings were going fast to ruin, shrines, temples, mosques, the brick walls of gardens, and public offices, and the residences of the gentry: and yet I am told that fifteen years ago this was one of the finest towns in Oude, and that it was surrounded by fields of the finest crops, so that it was described as one magnificent garden.

HALT AT BURAECH—INTRIGUES.

Camp, Indra, Dec. 23.

As there will, no doubt, be some carping in the press here, and possibly at home, at the delay which took place at Buraech, it may be as well to explain that there were political reasons for it. Nobody here cares to surrender. Next Mammoo Khan makes overtures. Now, the Begum herself, and Rugbeer Kooley Khan's letters and emissaries to the Civil Commissioner, major Barrow. Old Hurdutt Singh sets off to see his partizans, posted with his elephants and guns at Mahadeo Bukshi, and to smuggle off nothing to submission. Major Barrow believes that if his chief are not pressed, and if the Commander-in-Chief halts while delicate manipulation and subtle diplomacy are at work, there is a great probability that they will come in and lay down their arms, but if they are not allowed time to consider our propositions they will fly where we cannot follow them, and cause trouble, annoyance and expenditure. Maun Singh thinks they will come in too. The Commander-in-Chief is anxious to press on the moment his columns are up. He insists that Bainie Madho's followers must lay down their arms in camp, and that a similar condition shall be attached to the submission of all the other chiefs. But then there are the express promises and the spirit and the provisions of the proclamation to be considered and respected; Vakeels or Karindas—emissaries past and unpaid—the solicitudes and offices of friendship, are all busy.

THE NANA SAHIB AND HIS RETREAT.

All this time there is one farther off whose name is seldom mentioned except with bated breath and eager looks,—one of whom there are more thoughts and words. The Nana is in the jungle fort of Churda, living with the Rajah of the place, which lies eight or nine miles north of Nanparah. To secure him is now actually the great object avowed by most people except the authorities. But he must not be startled from his lair—there must be no precipitate hasty move to frighten the cowardly, sanguinary heart of Bithoor, till the toils are around him. And it will be difficult indeed to set them surely, for he is amid the jungles, where his nature must be at home, and his capture will be effected probably by treachery and stratagem rather than by force. Already he is roused and away.—Since I have wrote the few lines above, we hear that the Nana has removed from Churda to the north-west, in denser jungle still. We shall see. There is £15,000 set on his person,—if it were on his dead body, Nana Sahib's head might soon be in our camp. We cannot secure the death even of the Nana by an offer for him "dead or alive," though it is true we paid the Rajah of Powayne the reward offered for the capture of the Moulvie on account of the production of his dead body only. There are, however, other means on which we may rely with more confidence—the treachery and avarice of his own friends. Already active brains are at work, and the spiders are spinning their threads. Anon we shall learn the result.

ATTEMPTS TO SECURE THE NANA.

When we were at Fyzabad Major Bruce, the chief of police in Oude, made inquiries at Ajoodhia respecting the religious instructor of the Baraech aristocracy who they visited the shrines of the Holy City. A fakir of eminence was named to him as the counsellor and adviser of the Rajah of Churda and of other northern Chiefs. Major Bruce sent for the fakir, and found him finely susceptible to the promptings of self-interest; so that he not only readily agreed to use his influence with the Rajah of Churda to deliver the Nana into our hands, but offered to send his nephew, a priest of the same temple, along with Major Bruce as an agent who might go to the Rajah with more weight and address than any ordinary messenger. The chief of police had already endeavoured to communicate with the Rajah through other channels, and he was well pleased to find that the latter, as far as outward appearances went, was quite ready to betray the Nana, if he was allowed to keep as many guns as Maun Singh, as many armed followers as Maun Singh, and his fort like Maun Singh. Now, it is not easy to see what this equation with Maun Singh can have to do with the Rajah of Churda, and the explanation is easy.—The latter chief, of whom probably no one in the world, except some obsolete old East Indian, ever heard before is an old rival of Maun Singh, and he wishes now by our means to obtain as much power as the wily Rajah of Fyzabad, against whose ability and influence he has, no doubt, been long struggling in vain. As Maun Singh's fort will soon be dismantled, his guns destroyed, and his armed followers limited to a certain number, there was no objection to promising the Rajah of Churda that he should have the same privileges of his great rival, but whether he will not consider us guilty of keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope remains to be seen. A strong letter has, at all events, been addressed to him assuring him that if he captures the Nana he will not only receive all that he asks, but secure the favour and rewards of the British Government.

THE RESOLUTE BEGUM OF OUDE.

Hunted to the verge of the Terai, beaten on all sides, the Begum still boldly demands fixed terms for herself and her son, while Bainie Madho declares he will adhere to the young King as long as the latter desires him to hold out. These people will not trust our promises unless they are specific. To call on them to "throw themselves on the mercy and clemency of the Government of India" is to use a set of phrases which to their minds conveys no idea—for to the Oriental an appeal of the sort has no answer in head or heart. It amuses just as much as my friend Maun Singh's general did when he made me a present of the horse which I admired. And so the Begum stands out. "Name the sum I am to receive for the maintenance of myself and son," says the resolute lady. "I want you to write down how many rupees a-year I am to get, for what is the use of living if we are to be in beggary, and you have taken from us the whole Kingdom of Oude?" But neither Lord Clyde nor Major Barrow can accede to the proposal. They are not authorised by the Government to fix any sum as a pension for the rebellious family, while, by the directions of the Government, they are almost constrained to exhaust every effort to induce them to surrender. The Begums do not come in therefore; another the principal lady who has been the soul of the Rebellion at Oude, for the two young ladies who must stand that they were about to forego all their grandeur to submit to Dunbar Dur, the Rajah of Gonda, has sent in vakeels, but as long as the Begum holds out he, like Bainie Madho, will not surrender.

THE "CHASE" NOT EXTINCT.

This "chase-or-take-him" is weary work for officers and men. It is inglorious and unprofitable, and the most done not like, so that the truest dogs are at fault. Of course the Government at home and out here find it more weary still. "Why is it not finished at once?" is the cry. Simply because we cannot catch Tantia Topee, or force the Oude party to fight or submit. "But why don't you do either?" Because we put it in a physical impossibility, particularly when the action of arms is suspended by diplomacy. Look at the map—the Oude forces are within sight of Nepaul. The [illegible] like slopes of the mountains, towards the dead level of Oude, are forests of untold depths, in which man has never set his foot. In the ravines formed by the course of innumerable torrents are paths known by a few who are unknown to us, which lead into the dreary solitudes of the mountains between Nepaul and the Terai. Here and there some forts are perched amid bristling precipices, screened by dense forests.—Between us and the spurs of the great range which rise like some giant wall to shut Hindostan from the outer world, are the plains up to the Terai. These plains are to us terra incognita.

DELIGHTS OF TRAVELLING.

See how painfully the Quartermaster-General and his assistants have to pick out their way from the villages. Every step is to be weighed beforehand. "How deep is the river there?" "Sometimes up to the neck, at others up to the waist." "Is the bottom soft or hard?" "It is middling."—"Is there no ford?" "Yes, five kos (i.e., ten miles) lower down there is a ford knee-deep." "Could guns get over it?" "I don't know; they might stick." "What kind of a road is it to the next village?"—"There are open plains, jheels, or swamps, and streams to cross, then a thick belt of trees, then jungle?" "Can guns go through the jungle?" "The path is narrow, they had better go round." Between Buraech and Intha, in one march of seventeen miles, we skirted a jungle the whole way; we passed over a plain without any cultivation or inhabitants, except enormous herds of small and scrubby cattle and their fierce and frightened attendants.

Fitting out the 'Great Eastern.'

On Monday the first steps towards preparing this vessel for sea was made by hoisting in the main shaft of the paddle engines one of the largest and finest specimens of forged iron work which has ever been completed by steam machinery in this country. The weight of the whole mass was nearly forty tons and after the forging was completed—a work of no ordinary difficulty with a piece of such magnitude—every part of it was carefully turned in steam lathes in Mr. Scott Russell's yard. The latter operation lasted a considerable time and since its completion the shaft has remained at the Russel works until all the legal technicalities connected with the transference of the ship and its fittings from the old to the new company had been complied with. All these arrangements have now been definitely settled, and on Monday the shaft was removed and placed on the port side of the upper deck of the great ship. In order to move such a ponderous weight and raise it to the required height it was necessary to secure the service of one of the new floating derricks which have recently been employed with such success in raising and transporting masses of the heaviest description. The wooden derrick was used on this occasion, and performed the task with a facility little short of marvellous. In one hour from the time that the great machine went alongside of Mr. Scott Russells yard the whole operation was completed, and the monstrous, awkward-looking piece of iron safe on the deck of the great ship.

Measures had been taken to ascertain if depositing such a mass of dead weight on the extreme edge of the deck made the least difference in the vessel's trim, but not the slightest alteration was preceptible. The next step of hoisting it more aft, lowering it down the engine hatch, and fitting it into its place, will be undertaken in a few days. On Tuesday the rudder, weighing twenty eight tons, was also removed from Mr. Scott Russel's yard, and placed on board the Great Eastern. The present main shaft is the fourth that has been made for the colossal engines of this vessel. The first three were failures, but the last one made by the Lancefield Forge Company, near Glasgow, is, as we have said, the finest specimen of iron work of its kind that has ever been produced in this or any other country. The register of the Great Eastern as belonging to the Great Ship Company was signed on Monday at the Custom-house. It is not probable that the other works necessary for fitting the vessel for sea will commence before the end of the present month, when the contractors will be bound under penalties to have all finished in five months from the date of the time of commencing operations.

Lecture by Father Chiniquy.

SEPARATION OF ST. ANNE'S FROM THE CHURCH OF ROME.

From the Toronto Globe March 11.

Father Chiniquy of St. Anne's Ile, last night gave an account of his dealings with the Church of Rome, and of the reasons which had induced him to separate from that community. The audience, though not large was of unquestionable character, the body of the St. Lawrence Hall being nearly filled. Around the platform sat a Congregation of all denominations, among whom were the Rev. Dr. Willis, Principal of Knox's College, Rev. Dr. Lilly, Rev. Dr. Burns, Rev. Dr. Fyfe, Rev. M. J. Grasett, Rev. Mr. Ardagh, (Baptist) Rev. Mr. Cox, (Methodist) Rev. Mr. Meade, (Anglican) and Rev. Mr. Johnson.

Hector Christie, Esq., took the chair. The Hall was crowded. The meeting was preceded by prayer and commenced by singing the 100th Psalm, Old Version. On the 4th inst. I spoke [illegible] in the State of Illinois, a fact which cannot pass without being noticed by the Catholic and Protestants of this country. A whole people, brought up in the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church, turned away from their Bishop whom they were taught from their infancy to respect. They have driven away their priest; they have publicly broken the sacred ties which had united them to the Roman Catholic Church from their birth. I have been invited by some friends here to give you the history of this—to tell you how it is a whole people have come to the conclusion that Christians, they ought to separate themselves as from the church in which they ought to separate themselves as from the people in which they have been raised. I have accepted the invitation, but you are already that I am not accustomed to speak much in English, and I hope you will make allowance for my French origin and will excuse me if I do not speak as well in English as you would perhaps like to hear me. (Applause.) Many amongst you believe I am the author and leader of the movement, of which I am here to speak.—Such is not the fact. What has occurred, is a thing which has come from above. It is the work of the Almighty.—I am only the witness of what I will tell you. The people of St. Anne's have lost their faith, their confidence, their belief in their superiors not suddenly; it has been brought about by many circumstances;—and those circumstances I will lay before you, so that you may be judges of what has been done. My position is very difficult. As a Christian I must not hurt the feelings of any one, but I have to bring before you facts which will, perhaps, be unpleasant to many. In doing this I take my God to witness that I have no bad feeling against any one;—I bless those who curse me; and love those who have spoken evil against me. Now, my dear friends, I will tell you how the French Canadians of Illinois have lost faith in their superiors. About 10,000 of my countrymen who went to the State of Illinois since 1851, have made a settlement and raised chapels in their midst. In Chicago they built a very fine church. After that church had been built, the Bishop of Chicago took it from the hands of my countrymen and sold it to another people for a rent of $2,000 per year. The priest who had been put at the head of the congregation was dismissed and the house we had built for him was taken by the Bishop and sold without our permission. Then the people sent a deputation, and we enquired by what right he had taken away the house of our priest.—He turned away the deputation with these words:—"I am French Canadians, you can't have your religion. If you did, you would know that I have the right to sell your churches and all your church property, and to go where I like to eat and drink away the money in the way I like." I cannot tell you what were the feelings among the people at these words. Many of them were ready to give up the Church in which they were educated, at once. I opposed them. I told them—"That is the bad way of one man; you cannot conclude that all the other Roman Bishops will do the same thing. What you have to do is to appeal to the other Bishops of the United States and Canada, and I have no doubt they will do you justice; they will compel this Bishop to give you back your property, and you will continue to live in the Holy Catholic Church." They took my advice, and wrote supplications to all the Bishops of the United States and Canada. What was the result? The result was, that what the Bishop of Chicago had done was said to be right. Soon after that time the Bishop came to St. Anne's where my residence is. I was there building a small house, at my own expense. I had broken the stones myself from the quarry with very great labour and fatigue. The Bishop came to me and said—"Mr. Chiniquy, whose house is this? I said,—"It is my house, my lord." "And whose premises are these?" "They are mine." 'How did you get them?' asked the Bishop. I replied, "I built them with my own money." "Where did you get the money?" "I told him I got the money honestly."—He then said that I must give him my house and I said I would not. (Applause.) He said I was not a good priest, and if I did not give him the property he would silence me; he would excommunicate me according to the law of the Church. "Well," I said, "if you will show me that law I will give you the deed of my property." He said if there is not such a law, I will pass one." I said, "My Lord I think you are too young and too small in the old Catholic Church to pass such a law." (Applause.) He went away, and two days after I received a letter from him, calling me to Chicago. I went and he told me if I did not leave St. Anne's in fifteen days he would excommunicate me. He said he wanted to send me on another mission. I gave him the reasons why I wished

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 16.

[illegible] Vincent Bury, in moving that this bill be read a second time, said that it was word for word the same bill that was discussed last session, and carried through the House after several divisions. He believed that he should not only commit the feeling of the House if he now moved the second reading without troubling the House with any observations. If the hon. members should urge anything new against the bill he should have an opportunity of reply at the close of the debate.

Mr. Hope said that the bill had only been printed and sent around that morning, and yet at once the House was called upon to pronounce its verdict. Where was the grievance? Had the promoters of this bill got one inch beyond the blue-book which had been got up by Messrs. Crowder and Maynard at the instigation of a few wealthy individuals who had not refused in their efforts? There was marshalled against this bill the preponderating feeling of the country. ("No, no!") Yes! the preponderating. ("No, no!") As long as they said "No no," he would say "preponderating" (Laughter.) There were marshalled against it the overwhelming feeling of the serious portion of the community ("No!"), the majority of the establishedchurch, a large proportion of the Dissenting community, and the whole of Scotland and Ireland without distinction of creed and politics. ("No, no!") Then why had they passed a law excluding Scotland or Ireland from the operation of the bill? Against the bill were also marshalled all those sacred feelings of home and domestic security, the very sacredness and holiness of which prevented their possessors from coming to that House for protection. The bill would introduce the brand of discord into the heart of every family in the country. ("Oh!") Every mother of daughters would fear for the marriages they might make. Every wife would look upon her sister as her prospective rival It would cause inquisition to be held upon every kind look, word, and offer of protection which the husband might make to his sister-in-law. The House were asked to pass a bill that would have these results because they were told that the children of a deceased wife ought to have a mother's protection from her sister. But what now prevented the widower from calling the aunt in? Pass this bill, and the aunt could only be brought in to take care of the children on condition that she would place herself in a position antagonistic to that of their late mother. At present no nearer relations could be formed between the aunt and the father. But if this bill passed, she was made a stepmother, whose interest and whose children's interests would compete with those of the first family. And that was called looking after the children. Arguments had been got up that this bill was necessary on behalf of the labouring man, who required some one to perform those domestic offices which the wives of the humbler classes are called upon to discharge But if they really knew the condition of the working classes, they would find that, according to the rules of social life and the habits of the labouring poor, the last person whose industry would be available for the children would be the sister of the first wife The families of the poor soon went out to service. The daughters were always dispersed, and the one who remained at home, and who would alone be available for the purpose of taking care of the children, was usually the most idle and good-for-nothing member of the family. So much for the case of poor. As plausible reasons might be urged in favour of marriage with a brother's widow as were urged in favour of these marriages. Such unions had occurred; but Messrs. Crowder and Maynard clearly did not happen to come within that category, as that no agitation was got up to legalise them. Why were marriages with a niece or an aunt left out of the bill? In all countries of Europe where either by dispensation or by common law marriage with the deceased wife's sister was allowed these marriages also were legal. The noble lord would find it rather difficult to justify this omission to those who seemed to think that, because this empire had reached the Roman height of power, it ought also to reach the Roman pitch of corruption.—He had been told by a hon. member that the religious arguments against these marriages were all nonsense, and that a charity boy could refute the whole bench of bishops on them. (Laughter.) If that be so, let the wonderful boy be produced—no doubt the House would relax its rules and allow him to be heard at the bar. [Laughter.] And then, perhaps the noble lord would find less difficulty in passing his bill than he had hitherto experienced. It ought never to be forgotten that, of all Christian ministers, Roderick Borgia—Alexander I.—was the first to come forward to give his sanction to these marriages. No one who had paid any attention to the state of the dwellings of the labouring classes could be ignorant to what temptations the young of both sexes were exposed; and it was not to be wondered at, therefore, that a few cases of marriages of this sort had occurred among them. A few cases of larceny occurred, yet no law had been passed to make pocket handkerchiefs common property; murders and infanticides were still numerous, and yet the penalties enacted against them by the law were not repealed. There was no grievance at all felt in the country from this prohibition. The whole agitation owing to a factitious and artificial kind got up by organised society, with a large brass plate and a paid secretary, and frequent advertisements in the newspapers were needed to keep it alive. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman concluded by moving that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. E. Hall said, as to the feelings of the ratepayers' societies on this matter, those with which he was more immediately connected were strongly in its favour, and 750 clergymen of the Church of England had petitioned in its favour.

Mr. Buxton asked how—If the verses in Leviticus really forbade these marriages—how came it that the Jews, who must surely have understood their own Scriptures had always looked on these marriages as perfectly lawful. That fact at once overthrew all the authorities by which others had sought to support the text. He thought them that Jews had unequivocally held marriages should be confined to obey their own ecclesiastical discipline, instead of granting the relaxation to clergymen which were not really found in the Word of God.

Mr. Ellesmere thought the House of Commons was acting discreditably in a manner very characteristic of what was called the [illegible] (Laughter.) It was only a week [illegible] the House [illegible] in its representative capacity, to recently insist. Then [illegible] that the offering of [illegible] which were given [illegible] of the Jewish [illegible] Now the [illegible] Jewish [illegible] to permit incest; but it was the systematic consideration.—(Laughter.) And now the House of Commons was asked to permit latent evils of any considerable at all. Both Catholics and Protestants were agreed that the thing was wrong; but this hand of private judgment put an end to all questions of right and wrong. Every man pretended to judge for himself. A great deal was made of the argument that the House of Commons had often sanctioned this measure; but he denied the competency of the House of Commons to decide questions of this nature. Incest was incest, pure what laws they chose, and no man would commit it who had any value for what God's opinion of it was. There was nothing new in this—it was as true the beginning. God said "You shall not eat this apple. Man said, "I will." God said "You shall not commit incest." Man said "I will." There were certain families within his own knowledge to whose happiness the passing of this bill would be certain ruin.

Mr. Arkroyd trusted that as this measure was advancing year by year in public opinion, and that as the majorities in its favour in the House of Commons were yearly larger, it would now be allowed to pass into law.

General Thompson, as all his constituents seemed to want to marry their deceased wife's sisters (laughter), begged to say a word in favour of the second reading of the bill. If the bench of bishops chose to put the issue on a false ground, there was very little doubt that their argument might be confuted by a charity boy, as had already been said: just though they were held in high respect, the country did not take all its opinions from the right reverend bench. The great mass of the people believed not only that these marriages were not unlawful but they were ordered by divine law; and they would therefore suffer no human law to stand in the way of them.

Lord J. Russell: I cannot but allow that it is in itself a misfortune and a disadvantage that that feeling which has hitherto prevailed, that when a man marries a woman the sisters of that woman become his sisters—that all his feelings, all his conduct to them in the most domestic intimacy—with relation to their affections, it may be with reference even to their marriage—are guided by the same sympathies, the same care, and, I may add, the same reverence which are due to a sister; I cannot but feel I say, that it is a great disadvantage and a great misfortune that that tie should be weakened by any alteration in the law of marriage. (Cheers.) But, while I admit that on the one hand, I think that there is a great and practical evil which we cannot very well refrain from remedying.—The evil is not among the upper classes of society; but there is no doubt partly among the middle classes and much more among the lower classes, a feeling that after the death of the wife there is often no person so fit to take care of the children as the beloved sister of that wife. [Hear.] With the confined space and the close dwellings in which they live intimacy in no long time grows into that kind of affection that they wish to confirm it by the ties of marriage, and to those persons it does not appear not seeing blood relations—that there is a sufficient reason why they should not contract marriage. [Hear, hear.] I am afraid that your law has been found useless in its prohibitions, and that it has failed to make people feel that those near relations are sisters, and marriage, therefore, ought not to be contracted between them. The consequence is that upon persons who live together on terms of intimacy, whose motives are innocent, and who have no other object in contracting marriage ties than to live together in comfort and respectability, and to give to the children that care and protection to which they are entitled, you impose the stigma of contumely, and upon the woman especially who is living in that condition you affix infamy and disgrace. [Cheers.] I believe that to be so great an evil that I am willing to submit to that other disadvantage to which I referred rather than refuse to remedy it. It is not, perhaps, in a great number of cases that these marriages would be contracted, but I think were persons to feel that they can without scruple contract them that they should be allowed to do so. [Hear, hear.] I do not, however, see any answer to the argument of the right hon. gentleman the Home Secretary with respect to other relationships of the same kind. I can well understand a line between the blood relations, among whom the guilt of incest is at once admitted and dreaded, and relations by marriage. That line is intelligible and distinct; but I own that, in my opinion, if you make this change in the law you cannot stop short where you are. [Cheers.] As the right hon. gentleman truly observed, the man says, "I take you for my wife, your mother for my mother, your aunt for my aunt, your sister for my sister." Those are relations of the same kind, and I do not see, if Parliament agrees to the change in the law now proposed, how it can stop short of a change to a still greater extent. Neither can I see any justice in saying to the man, "You shall have certain advantages, you may contract a marriage that suits you, but your widow shall not have the same opportunity." [Hear, hear.] In voting, therefore, for the second reading of this bill I should consider the change in the law utterly imperfect unless you further alter it so as to make it equally applicable to both sexes, and to all the degrees of relationship which have been mentioned. I certainly feel the question to be one of great difficulty, and it is not without some reluctance that I feel bound to vote upon it. [Cheers.]

Mr. Walter said it was not a question only of what they would give by the bill; but it was also a question of what they would take away; and it was his belief, founded upon personal experience, that what they proposed to give would not compensate for what they proposed to take away. (Cheers.)

Lord Bury, in reply, said: With regard to the Scriptural objections to the bill its opponents had been beaten in many a hard-fought field, and at last they were obliged to take refuge in the state of the canon law. The canon law appeared to him to be obligatory only as often and in such cases as those who advocated that law chose to deem it to be binding upon them. He ventured to assert that there was no clergyman, who responded that law as binding upon him. He believed that by that law a clergyman was not allowed to go into a public-house on Sunday. He did not say that any clergyman did so (laughter); but he had no doubt that if a clergyman wished to go into a public-house on Sunday he would find no legitimate reason there was a canon against him. He believed that one of the canons said that clergymen should not marry widows or servants; but he ventured to say that many clergymen had married widows, if not servants. He had ignored instances of the latter. The opponents of the bill having been driven from the canon law, which was their stronghold, contended that the bill was morally incorrect. That point was [illegible] urged by the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and there he believed, was the [illegible] of which any notice ought to be taken. The right hon. gentleman said that these [illegible] contracted [illegible] were [illegible] between [illegible] and that, in fact, when you married a woman you married her whole family. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) He (Lord Bury) should like to submit that opinion to the impartial verdict of the whole community of England. Did the right hon. gentleman mean for a moment to say that when a man married a woman he made her mother his mother, and was there anybody who would like that arrangement? ("Either, here," and laughter.) He (Lord Bury) maintained there was no relationship, and though he, as a young member of the House, should feel the greatest hesitation in gainsaying the authority of the right hon. gentleman, still he asserted that to mix up the ties of consanguinity and affinity in that manner was not a fair argument to offer against the bill. (Cheers.) Would any hon. gentleman with a smattering of physiology say that by marrying a woman you mixed one drop of your blood with that of her relations? He thought that was a perfectly untenable argument. There was another question which was raised by the hon. member for Surrey. The gentleman was an old member of the House, and he (Lord Bury) was, as he had said, a young one. It would not therefore, be decent to bandy personalities or hard words with that hon. gentleman, but when he stigmatised these marriages as incestuous (although a large portion of the House believed them to be not incestuous at all) he attempted unjustly to prejudice the House against the bill. Then there was an argument which had been adduced by the noble lord the member for the City of London, and that was that if a man ought to be permitted to marry the sister of the deceased wife he ought also to be permitted to marry his deceased wife's niece and other relations in the same category. He had no answer to make to that. (Derisive cheers.) This bill was simply to legalise marriage with a deceased wife's sister. The order of the day which preceded this was a bill about tramways in Ireland, and you might as well say that tramways ought to include roads of all descriptions as say that this bill, which was brought in for a special purpose, ought to make provision for something else. When a bill was brought in for a special object he submitted that Parliament ought to discuss that object alone, and ought not to allow its attention to be diverted to collateral matters. He quite admitted that the same reasons which were urged in support to this bill applied to the legislation of marriage with the relations of a deceased wife; but if the bill had gone to that extent its passing through Parliament would be impeded. (Laughter). The grievance of a man not being allowed to marry his deceased wife's niece was so small as to be infinitesimal,—he might say, almost invisible, and it was therefore not deemed necessary to encumber the bill with any provisions on that subject. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the House would by another division defeat the attempt which the hon. member for Maidstone had made to stop the progress of the measure. [Cheers, and cries of 'Divide.']

The House then divided, when the numbers were—

For the second reading.....	135
Against it.....	77

The bill was therefore read a second time.

The new Man Monkey.

At the Royal Institution, London, Professor Owen recently delivered a lecture to a crowded audience on the Gorilla, the recently-discoverred animal of Central Africa, which bears the nearest resemblance to man of any one of the monkey tribe that has hitherto been discovered, not excepting the chimpansee. The first traces of this creature were made known in this country in 1847, and from the bones and sketches of it which Professor Owen received from missionaries, he inferred that the Gorilla was one of the most highly developed species of the monkey group.—In August last, a specimen of the Gorilla, preserved in spirits, was recived at the British Museum, and a well-executed drawing of it, by Mr. Wolff was exhibited. Professor Owen first pointed out the anatomical characteristics of the Gorilla, which distinguished it from other species of monkeys, and he afterwards mentioned such particulars of its habits as he has collected from those who have visited that part of Africa where it is found. The points in which it approaches nearer to man than any other quadrumanous animal, are the shorter arm—particularly the shortness of the humerus compared with the fore-arm—a longer development of the great toe, a projecting nose bone, and the arrangement of the bones of the feet to enable the creature to stand more erect. The drawing of the Gorilla from the specimen in the British Museum, though only two-thirds grown, represented a most formidable animal, and, compared with the skeleton, of the full-grown specimen, the skeleton of man seemed very slim and delicate. Not only are the bones and muscles calculated to give great strength, but the large capacity of the chest indicated the powerful energy with which they were stimulated. The part of Africa where the Gorilla is found, lies from the equator to 20 degrees south, on the western portion, in a hilly country abounding in palm trees and luxuriant vegetation. Its food consists of fruit and vegetables, and it habitation is in the woods, where it constructs nests of the interwined boughs perched at heights varying from 12 feet to 50. It avoids the presence of the negroes, and is but seldom seen, but it is known to them as "the stupid old man." The want of intelligence that has induced the negroes to give it that name is shown by its carrying away fruits and sugar canes separately, instead of tying them together and carrying several off at the same time. It is in then returning to take away its provender into the woods piecemeal that the negroes take the opportunity of waiting for and shooting it. The Gorilla is a formidable enemy to encounter and in case the gun miss its mark, or only maim the animal, the negro is quickly overtaken and killed, or dreadfully mangled by the large and fe teeth of the creature.—Sometimes when a negro is passing unawares under a tree, in which a Gorilla is seated, it will reach down its arm and snatch the man up by the throat and hold him till he is strangled. The elephant is an object of its attack, as they both live on the same food, and holding on to a high branch with its hind feet, it will stoop down and strike the elephant with a club. The Gorilla exhibits a strong attachment to its young, as an instance of which it was mentioned that a female and her two young ones having been shot in a tree, she instantly up and ran with it into the woods, and then returned to finish the other. Her retreat had in the meantime been cut off, and when the gun was levelled at her, as she held her young one to her breast, she waved her arm as if to beseech for mercy. But it was in vain; for a bullet was sent through her heart, and the young one was wounded and captured. The Gorilla is considered cross walking erect, with its arms behind its neck its usual mode of progression, however, is in all fours. Professor Owen mentioned several other points in the habits of the animal, as well as in its anatomy, to show its superiority to other animals, and concluded by observing on the fatal effects of quadrumanes to show that the Gorilla, like man, had not existed till the earth had attained its present condition.

The Tariff.

Mr. Galt will possibly fail in carrying his Tariff through the House. Politicians of both sides look upon its chances of success with great anxiety. Every one must feel the great difficulty which presses upon a Finance Minister, when he proposes the manner of filling the Public Treasury.—Each class of traders and consumers sees special reasons for the exemption from taxes, and their prejudices, coming from the pocket, are unmoveable. As a rule luxuries should be taxed before necessaries, but at a moment like the present, luxuries are out of the question; nobody can afford the indulgence, and therefore no revenue could be derived from an import upon them. The only course then open is, to tax wherever revenue can be expected. The credit of the country must be maintained, and to expect to live through the present depression, without perceiving it, is mere moonshine. There is a good deal said about advantages given to Montreal at the expense of Toronto. It is time the whole province was looked upon by statesmen as one country. The interests of each neighborhood are local only, and Toronto has no more claim to sympathy than any other portion. If benefits arise from closer connection between Montreal and the upper country, we see no reason why it should not be encouraged. Mr. Galt's tariff may be made 'more perfect by other hands, but in our estimation he is quite as capable of conducting the business of his office as any of his predecessors. From the difficulties of his position he is entitled to great allowances for his apparent deficiencies.

Mr. Conger and the Orangemen.

It is said that a proposal had been made by Mr. W. S. Conger, to one of the Orange Lodges in this neighbourhood, that he be admitted to membership, and that his offer had been declined, upon the ground that his moral standing cannot be held equal to the requirements of the Order, so long as he lies under the imputation of having embezzled the funds of the town of Peterborough. This decision is very creditable to the Orange Institution; and, as it is said that Mr. Conger denies having made the application for admission, and having suffered a refusal, it will be most agreeable to his friends, if he submits the contradiction through the Review. As the matter is now received, the reflection is most damaging to the Warden of the United Counties of Peterboro' and Victoria. Mr. Conger should have gone to a distance to seek admission.

At the meeting of the Town Council on Monday evening, Mr. Burnham brought forward on behalf of the Port Hope Railway Company, a proposition that the Council should petition the Legislature to allow the Company to exchange second mortgage bonds with the Grand Trunk Company, in place of the £30000 first mortgage bonds, now held by them in security for the subsidy they had granted to the Port Hope road. Mr. Burnham told a very good story, but as nobody believes a word he says since the falsehoods he told about having paid his taxes regularly, they not then being paid for three years, his efforts in behalf of the Port Hope Company were unavailing. Mr. Fowler made a mistake in selecting him to carry his livery in the Board of Directors. It is the misfortune of all our public undertakings that their management is eagerly sought after by sharpers, who look to them as their prey. Mr. Fowler ought to have tact enough to attend to the established character of his straw-men.

Too Fine for Use.—The N. Y. Saturday Times has some sensible comments upon the lack of comfort in many of the dwellings of modern times. The writer truly says that too many houses in American cities are so fine that the people who own them are afraid to use them. The following parlour sketch is well drawn:—"Call in at my brown stone front "above Blocker," at any time except on the occasion of the great "spread," and it has the air of a very nice old maid in morning gown and curl papers—a cross between mus pensive and painful desolation. Everything exists in a state of bagginess. The sofa is a mute inglorious corpse in dimity winding sheet. The chairs are put away in aprons [illegible] skeletons. The chandelier wraps its nightcap around it. The shutters are closed to keep from fading the carpets, and only here and there through the crack, a little bit of sacred light peeps in and loiters as if it considered you fearfully impertinent for daring to come in and disturb its elegant entertainment and brown linen repose. It is very much like going into a family vault after an epidemic, and having a lively time with a party of corps in fresh grave clothes. In fact you feel decidedly like making the return of the house why she doesn't complete the picture by putting up the shutters from the parlours, and hanging up the week's washing. Soberly, this always sings corpsy-manly, which makes people expensive, and drives father and son out of doors for that comfort which their own home is far too fashionable to afford them, is a glaring nuisance, and has at the bottom of half the social evils of the day. When a man comes home, after the fatigues of business, after [illegible] to a private palace, but a vile [illegible] to [illegible] to his own hearth, to engage a wife and children whose daily thought is how it can all be [illegible] [illegible] upon the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Miscellaneous Memoranda.—[illegible] destroyed by a gunpowder explosion [illegible] Dr. Lardner [illegible] number containing the proceeding while in progress on a dairy-farm in the vicinity of [illegible], in which the tenant was restricted, by a most binding clause in his lease, from ever breaking up hereafter land of the holding under any circumstances whatever; but he [illegible] obtained permission to make a single exception, the owner of the land was so well satisfied with the result as to remind his predecessor whether it was brought for by the tenant, who was a suspicious Scotchman, and settlement practitioner in the "auld country." The mode adopted was the following, and in the carrying out of which no expense or labor was regarded as too great, while the interests of a dairy of forty cows afforded the means of reclaiming even a waste.

After feeding the meadow until late in August, it was then covered with long manure from the farm-yard, which was turned under to the depth of the staple of the soil and the land sown with Winter rye, with a plentiful allowance of seed, the crop being mown in the Spring following as feed for the dairy cows in their stalls, the plough following as the land is cleared of the crop, and when all was gone, then a regular stirring and working of the soil took place, with a careful cleaning, giving space between each manuring for the green first seed weeds which were destroyed by being turned under, and when it was as "clean as a garden the surface was spread with a covering of compost that had been prepared for the purpose, which was turned under as slightly as possible and the land was then sown with the choicest grass in abundance, with the certainty of a full mowing crop the ensuing summer.

There can be no doubt that poverty and exposure to the elements are the cause of a very great proportion of the maladies with which our stock of all kinds is affected, and nothing would be so gratifying to a humane man as to remedy these evils, or be so easy of accomplishment, provided he be endowed with the blessings of the will and the means—blessing which our pious minister assures us may be obtained by "prayer and perseverance."—Boston Cultivator.

A Remarkable Ceremony.

The rite of Masonic baptism was performed at New Orleans a few days ago by Foyer Maconnique Lodge, F. A. M.

"The Hall was arranged after the fashion of a lodge room, there being a large canopy at the head for the Worshipful Master; canopies at the sides for the other officers; a band of music and chorus of singers on a stage at the foot of the hall, tables with candelabras, and the emblems of the order, disposed as in lodge room; and in front of the stage at the head a large baptismal altar with steps ascending on all sides, and inclosed by a railing. On the altar was a stand bearing an open Bible, and at its sides a large urn and a large censer, with which to administer baptism by water and fire.—The different lodges entered one at a time, music being given in the interrals, and ranged themselves around the altar and on the stage to the right and left of the Worshipful Master's throne. When all was arranged preparatory to the ceremony, the aspect of the hall was perfectly gorgeous. The Worshipful Master of Foyer Maconnique, Joseph Santini, addressed the assembly in French and English, explaining the nature and objects of masonry, and the nature of the ceremony about to be performed. After that, sixteen boys, the eldest about 12 years old, and the youngest an infant, all clad in white and wearing red scarfs, were escorted upon the altar, attended by their parents and godfathers and godmothers, who took seats around, inside the railing. An invocation chorus from Mozart's "Mysteries of Isis," was sung by the choir. The Rev. C. S. Hodges, Grand Chaplain of the M. W. Grand Lodge, offered a prayer, the multitude standing. A prayer was next sung by the choir; the poetry composed for the occasion by Luton P. Cenonge, and set to an air of Rossini. [Luton is a title given to a child of protege of the Masonic order.]—After that came the baptism. The ceremoney was performed by the Worshipful Master. The boys were led up, and their left hands dipped in the water of the urn a feeling explanatory address being made to them at the time. The censer or flame was then swung over them; and having received purification by water and by fire, the solemn part of the ceremony was ended. The W. M. next hung on the neck of each child a blue ribbon and medal; kissing them, and making remarks adapted to their comprehension. We regret that the lateness of the hour should forbid our giving a more particular report of this impressive spectacle, which was witnessed with so much interest and manifest feeling by the thousands of people present. The remainder of the ceremony consisted of a presentation of rings to the mothers of the children, and white gloves to their godmothers; a recitation of poetry in English and French by Luton Ed. Feerenbach; an address by the W. M. to the godfathers; confirmation of the Lutons; and music by the orchestra and choir. After that, the godmothers of the children and the masters of the ceremony raised a collection for the benefit of the Masonic widows and orphans; and the last thing in the programme was the oration of the day, delivered by Mr. J. M. Hernandez.

The Two Colonels.

A trial which occupied Lord Campbell and a special jury in the Court of Queen's Bench for five days, and which was concluded on Tuesday last, has excited a good deal of public attention. It is always so when a private scandal becomes the subject of public investigation, and in the present case the suitors, whose causes have been postponed in consequence of this lengthy trial, have good ground of complaint.—There was all the excitement of a personal contest between the persons of some station in the world. There were crimination and recrimination. There was abundance of contradictory evidence from excited witnesses. There were eloquent and angry speeches from the counsel on both sides.—None of the elements of a great forensic deal were wanting, but we cannot help thinking, now that it is over, that the case ought never to have come into court. We do not say that the plaintiff ought not to have brought his action, and, indeed, he was bound to do so, for his honour and reputation were at stake. We may even go further and express our satisfaction that English law affords redress against the insolence of high rank and the partiality of authority. But the quarrel ought not to have been carried into the law courts, and ought not to have been left to a jury for the settlement. The first of Wilton, by virtue of his rank, was colonel of the regiment; but entirely ignorant of military matters. Colonel Dickson, an old gentleman and a veteran officer, was [illegible] and actually [illegible] the Queen's Guards. The colonel made the usual monthly returns required by Lord Wilton; but Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson [illegible] found [illegible] discovered by Lord Wilton, who, considering charges against Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson, [illegible] ing his dismissal from the regiment. A court of inquiry was assembled to investigate the matter referred to, and the result was that Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson was acquitted of [illegible] charges against him, and that Lord Wilton was found guilty of [illegible] Lord Wilton pleaded that his representations to the Horse Guards were privileged, and that the publications stamped slander and libel upon him.

We will not venture to express an opinion upon the conduct of either of the parties. [illegible] however, appeared to prove that Colonel Dickson had kept his accounts in an unbusiness-like manner.—According to the opinion of the military witnesses, the truth would seem to be that he ought never to have meddled with the accounts at all. Colonel Dickson, as commanding officer, should have [illegible] both Adjutant and subaltern officers to the mess accounts; he should have called one or more mess meetings to consider what should be done to free the regiment from embarrassment—since embarrassed it was—had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ed a penny of the money. Starting with this false step, it appears that Colonel Dickson obtained the ill-will of some officers under his command. Things went on then for some time from bad to worse. Lord Wilton was informed that charges of a pecuniary irregularity were made against his Lieutenant-Colonel, but for a long time he took no action in the matter, and this [illegible] point in his case. At length he caused the Adjutant to write a letter to Lord Combermere, which he himself signed, complaining of Colonel Dickson's conduct in the matters alleged, and craving inquiry. Lord Combermere's course thereupon appears to have been literally absurd. He confided [illegible] quest his own expression—that he could not "make head or tail" of the papers sent to him, but recommended that Colonel Dickson should be removed from the regiment, as he could not be induced to resign. The grounds upon which Lord Combermere based his recommendation were simply that the regulations had not been complied with, because the regimental accounts had not been settled when the regiment was disembodied. Nothing could have been more unfair to Colonel Dickson than that Lord Wilton and Lord Combermere should dispose of his case in his absence, and upon this circumstance Lord Campbell remarked in the course of his summing up with great, but not undeserved, severity.

The next step was a Court of Inquiry, ordered by General Peel, which met [illegible] weeks, and took evidence. It does not appear whether the Court made any report, but the result of their proceedings was that Colonel Dickson was summarily removed from his command without any reason given. This proceeding is certainly not capable of any justification. Colonel Dickson, justly feeling aggrieved, requested Mr. Duncombe to put a question in the House of Commons, and the hon. gentleman gave notice to Sir. Peel of his intention. Lord Wilton then called upon Mr. Duncombe, and in order to dissuade him from [illegible] Colonel Dickson with having embezzled some small sums of money. It is impossible to believe that Colonel Dickson was guilty of the paltry theft imputed to him, and Mr. Duncombe was satisfied that he was not. Failing in his attempts to obtain a full and open investigation from the War Office, Colonel Dickson appealed to a Jury in the Court of Queen's Bench. Lord Wilton signally failed to sustain his charges, and the conclusion was that the Jury found for Colonel Dickson on all the issues, and awarded him five pounds for the libels, and two hundred pounds for the slander. Bubble feeling went with the Jury, and the crowd inside and outside the Court hailed the verdict with prolonged cheering. The Jury, by their verdict, have pronounced the allegations of Lord Wilton to have been false and slanderous, and we trust that General Peel will see the propriety of restoring the injured officer to his rank in the army.

The Wallace Monument.

From the London Times.

About £5,000 has been subscribed for the purpose of erecting a Monument to the Scottish hero on the top of a hill near Stirling, which overlooks the scene of his victory over the English nearly six centuries ago; and, if we may take the opinion of a very competent authority, Mr. Sterling of Keir, who has just published a letter on the subject, addressed to the Lord Advocate, there is but one tolerable piece of sculpture to be found among the designs offered in competition for the designed monument,—namely, a lion, the Scottish lion of course, standing with his forepaws on the shoulder of a diabolical figure of England, crowned, brawny, and perfidious, but prostrate, with legs that are a pair of serpents. At the very least this demonstration is two centuries and a half out of date. From the moment that the Crowns of the two kingdoms were united, it became an impossibility, or possible only as a farce. Our Scottish friends seem not have the faintest idea that they are acting burlesque to the amusement of the world. Not only if the battle which they propose to commemorate one of the cancelled events of history, so that to grow over it at this time of day is like rejoicing on the anniversary of a wedding long after the marriage has been dissolved in the Divorce Court; the Wallace himself whose name is thus glorified in connection with the event is the merest myth. Unfortunately Scottish history has never yet been subjected to critical analysis, and Scotchmen believe in their old ballads and wild legends as implicitly as Englishmen once did in Arthur and his knights, or in Robin Hood and his merry men. Imagine Englishmen plotting up a monument to Robin Hood and Friar Tuck; or what if they were to take a leaf out of Mr. Stirling's pamphlet and build a house to King Arthur at [illegible] in the true Bombastic style of architecture Let Wallace have his monument, and let the Abbey Craig be consecrated with its [illegible] sculpture; but while there is yet time, we warn our sensitive cousins that gratitude evinced 600 years after the occasion of it is a rather ambitious commodity, and that the ancestors which they think of raising up to the brass lining an honor rather to Wallace or to themselves, will but awaken smiles at those who read it. It will be regarded as the glorifying of a literary myth, the memory of a reality, and the perpetuation under the name of authenticity, of a vile calumniation. To increase the absurdity of the whole affair, the Scottish correspondents [illegible] [illegible] as in England we are [illegible] [illegible] Prayer Book, the memorial of [illegible] [illegible] to the full as important as the [illegible] Abbey Craig or anything connected with Sir William Wallace. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Charge of Seduction by a Medical Man.

An action for seduction has occupied the Court of Common Pleas, before Lord Chief Cockburn, for several days. It was brought by a patisan, named Gardner, carrying on business on the Whitechapel road, against a medical man named Godfrey, in practice in Mount-place, Mount-street, Whitechapel-road.

The case excited great interest, and from the first day the crowds were so numerous that an additional police force was required to keep them back, and preserve order.—To their disgrace be it said, females have been most anxious to gain admittance; and on Monday two females were in court from the time of its sitting till its rising.

Mr. James in stating the case to the jury said this case came before them under most extraordinary circumstances. The plaintiff is a widower, and the defendant a married man, who resides in Finsbury-square, and has a shop opposite the plaintiff's. The defendant was the medical attendant of the mother, and committed the offence complained of, when he was in attendance on the mother, who was on her death-bed, on her daughter, about fourteen years of age.

Caroline Vincent Gardner deposed: I am the daughter of Mr. Henry Gardner, licensed victualler, of Whitechapel. I was fifteen years of age last April, and before Christmas, 1857, I was at school at Redhill near Edgware. I came home for my Christmas holidays on the 17th of December, 1857. I had known the defendant before that time for many years. On my return home from school I found he was attending my mother, who was confined in her room, and afterwards died on the 4th of March, 1858. On my return home until the 15th of January, I constantly saw the defendant at my father's house; about that time he asked my mother to allow me to visit Mrs. Godfrey, and remain with her for a week or a fortnight. My mother said she could not spare me, she was so ill. He said, "Oh very well, let her come for a day." She said she could only spare me for two or three hours, on which he replied "I'll come for you at three o'clock." He did so according to promise, and I went with him in a cab to his residence in Finsbury-square, and he introduced me to his wife. Whilst I was there, Mrs. Godfrey left the dining-room, and I was left alone with him, when he came and kissed me three times. I left about ten o'clock with the defendant in his cab to return home.—There were two seats in the cab. I sat with my back to the horse, and the defendant on the seat opposite me. He wished me to sit by his side, but I told him I would rather sit where I was. After that he wanted me to sit on his lap, and I tried to get away, but he prevented me saying "Do not be frightened." [Witness then detailed particulars of a most indecent nature.] I attempted to get away from him, and he said, Don't tell any one that I ever kissed you." He told me not to tell my papa or mamma, for it would break their friendship off. After some struggling I got to the opposite seat. The defendant took me to his surgery, nearly opposite to my father's house. I waited there some little time, after which he walked across with me to my father's house at the same time cautioning me not to tell my parents, or he would not make me any presents nor take me to any of the pic-nics he would go to. After this I saw him from time to time when he called to see my mother; and on one occasion he gave me a ticket for a ball at the London tavern. He lent me his cab and I and my brother went to the ball. A fortnight after he called and saw my mother in bed; I was in the sitting-room—the back room on the first floor—practising my music. When he came into the room he said "Never mind me; go on." I had been in the habit of singing and playing to him when my mother had been present. I sang him a song on this occasion, and when I had finished he said, "I want to speak to you; come here." He sat down on the couch and pulled me on his knee. (Witness here detailed the commission of the offence charged.) He said, "If you holloa, you will kill your mamma," (sensation.) When he let me go I opened the door, and went into mamma's room; he followed me a second or two after; just before this happened he had given me a scent-bottle. A landing separated the back room from the drawing-room where my mamma was confined; he did not fasten the door of the back-room but left it a little way open. When he gave me the scent-bottle, he said he would give me a little present some other day; and a few days after I went into my mother's room, when Mr. Godfrey came in, and as he left the room he kissed me in my mother's presence. I went into the sitting room with him where he wished me to sing to him again. I did not sing. I ran away saying "I cannot stop now for mamma is all alone." I remember having a conversation with Lavinia Spratt, my father's housekeeper, some time after when defendant had called to see my mother; on his leaving I went out with him on the stairs, and he kissed me, Lavinia Spratt saw him do it. I told her what the defendant had done to me, and I requested her to do something; and from that time the defendant had never after an opportunity of seeing me alone. I remember the death of my mother. The defendant visited her before that event. I was in the room with my mother sitting on the sofa. He came and sat on the sofa also but not near to me. I was then aware my mother was dying and I was in a state of great distress. He said, "never mind; don't cry. Every one must die, and I will be a papa and mamma to you." This was on the night of the 4th of March, when mamma died. In April defendant sent me some medicines, one a pink colour; and the other was very thick, and of a dark colour. It made me feel very sick after taking it, but it had no particular smell. I did not take the whole of the thick dark mixture. A few days after he had sent the medicines he called and saw me in the presence of Lavinia Spratt, the housekeeper. He told her (Spratt) she was to stand over me, and make me take my medicine, in consequence of her having informed him that I had not taken the last half-bottle. He did not tell me what the medicine was for; but he had spoken to the housekeeper. He also said at this time he wished me to come over to his surgery at one o'clock exactly, or a little after. I recollect the defendant's coming in August, when I was in my bedroom and undressed. He did not come into the room, but I came out on the landing. Lavinia Spratt was present. He told me to unfasten my dress, as he wished to listen to my chest. (Witness described indelicate treatment.) I was afterwards sent by my father with Lavinia Spratt to Mr. Debenham's, surgeon, who examined me, and informed me I was in the family-way. He examined me in the same way the defendant had done on the landing.—Whilst the defendant was examining me, Lavinia Spratt said, "There can be no occasion for that, doctor. You ought not to do it." He said, "You know nothing about it: allow me to understand it as a medical man." My father at this time was in the sitting-room, and he opened the door on to the landing. The defendant said to my father that I had a weak chest, and if I were not looked after I should go off like my mother [my mother died of consumption.] After Mr. Debenham examined me I was sent to Eltham and had a lodging in Miss Lucas's house. Mr. King, surgeon, attended me, and on the 10th of October I was confined of a male child which is still alive—Cross-examined by Mr. M. Chambers: I went to Mrs. Gibbs's school at Redhill; there were about forty girls there; I never told them there I was sixteen years of age. (Witness wept very much). My father keeps the Black Bull. I was at school about twelve months. I had been to school before that and came home at Christmas and Midsummer. My father has kept the house all my lifetime.—While home for the holidays I used to go to bed about eleven o'clock at night. I never served in the gin-shop. I have been in and out there, but not at night time. I have been at the bardoor for a short time at night. I never particularly noticed the women who came there. I don't know if most of them walked the street. I do not know of a club being held at the house; but lately a room near the bar has been set apart for gentlemen. I never heard of the Hen and Chicken club being held in my father's house. My brother who serves in the house, is seventeen years of age. Lavinia Spratt, who is sometimes called Mrs. Carleton, slept with me. The room was partitioned off. My father, mother and brother slept there during an alteration, one other holidays. The division was made by hanging up blankets and quilts. No one slept in the room with me after my mother's death except Miss Spratt. My father and brother slept in the same room they did before. If it had not been for my mother's death I should have gone back to school, I never agreed. I never listened to the language of the women. We did not stop anywhere on my return home in the cab. I remained at the surgery about a quarter of an hour, whilst he visited his patients. The surgery is nearly opposite my father's house. I waited for him because he said he would go over with me. I did not think there was anything wrong in his taking me on his knee. I was never told at school it was wrong, or that it was wrong for young men or old gentlemen to kiss me. Mamma once told the defendant when he kissed me in her presence that I was getting to old for it. I know it is wrong for young men to kiss me. The child was taken from me the day after its birth, and I don't know where it now is. [Witness positively denied intimacy with any one else.] By the judge: Why have you not made inquiries about your child?—Witness: Because I did not wish to know anything about it.—By the judge: Did you not think it was very extraordinary that the child was taken away without you seeing it?—Witness: I did not wish to know.—By the judge: Was it by your desire it was taken away?—Witness: No. In answer to other questions by the learned judge, the witness said she was aware Lavinia went regularly once a month to visit the child, but she made no inquiries about it.

Mr. Henry Gardner, the father, who is blind, was next called. He deposed: I am the plaintiff in this action. I am a licensed victualler, and have carried on business at the Black Bull twenty-three years. The girl has stated her age correctly as fifteen last birthday. I have known the defendant for fifteen or sixteen years, and he has attended my family about five years. I have been blind nearly seven years. The defendant attended my wife in her last illness. She died of consumption. I remember my child's visit to Mr. Godfrey's on the 15th January. He wished to take her to his house that his wife might hear her sing and play. During my wife's illness my daughter attended on her. I never knew that my daughter served in the bar. After my wife's death I found my daughter did not rise so early as I wished, and I made inquiries of Lavinia. I found afterwards that defendant was sending my daughter medicine; and in consequence of what Lavinia said to me my suspicion was aroused, and I had my daughter examined by Mr. Debenham on the 4th of August. He reported the result of the examination to me, and on following day I sent for the defendant. I was scarcely able to speak to him from agitation, and he asked if there was anything the matter. I said, "Only that my daughter is in the family-way, and you know all about it."—He said, "Pooh, pooh, nonsense; who told you about it?" I said, "I have sent her to a physician, and ascertained the fact." He said, "What physician?" I said, "That I must keep to myself; my solicitor will let you know all about it." He said, "Did she tell you so? If she did so she is a liar—a d—liar; this is a trap and conspiracy into which I don't mean to fall—this has been talked about." I asked him what he meant. He replied "It is something never home." I said, "Who is it?" He said, "Never mind; you go on, and I'll meet you." My daughter was confined on the 10th of October at Eltham, and I paid the expenses. I ordered that when the child was born it should be taken from her, and that she should never see it. I gave directions and pay for the child's provisions. My house is worth to me £3,000. I had placed her in the best school I could find, and I intended for her to have finished her education in Paris, because she has large expectations from my brother and sister. My son was educated in Germany.—Cross-examined: Mine is not a night house; it is abut about three o'clock in the morning; men and women frequent it. I have never known it called "the Kittens." I have only had three charges against my house; one was for harbouring prostitutes and thieves but that was dismissed. I don't keep a cock-and-hen club, but respectable females are admitted into my coffee-room, such as if you were to bring your lady there [laughter].—Mr. Chambers: Don't talk about me, sir.—Witness: The "Merry Birds," but not the "Two o'Clock Rangers," met at my house; the former are a few respectable gentlemen of the neighborhood, who use my drawing-room once a week.—Mr. Chambers: What sort of songs do the 'Merry Birds' sing (laughter)?—Witness: Very decent ones.—Re-examined: My wife had lived with me before our marriage, from the time the children were born.

Mrs. Lavinia Spratt deposed: I am a widow. I lived in the plaintiff's service before my marriage. When the defendant came I used to ring, but he desired me not to do so again, as he was a medical man and could go up without it. In January or February I saw the defendant kissing Miss Gardner indecently on the stairs. His back was towards me. She wore a short-sleeved dress, low at the neck, at the time—quite a child's dress. I recollect her going to Finsbury-square. He wished her at first to go there for a fortnight. Mrs. Gardner said she could not spare her so long.—He then said, "Let her come for a day, and stay with Mrs. Godfrey for a day and night. I do not think Mrs. Godfrey had ever seen her before then. The mother said, "No; she has never slept away a night without her father or myself being with her." He then said, "Will you allow her to come and take tea with Mrs. Godfrey, and bring her music? because I should like Mrs. Godfrey to her sing and play." Mrs. Gardner said, "If you can get her father's permission, you have mine." She accordingly went there. He frequently afterwards came to see her. I slept with her, and there was nothing the matter with her at the time. She had made no complaint to me up to this time, nor had I to him, about her health.—The defendant then left and came again the next day, and that was the time I saw him kiss her; and when she came down, I said, "How could you let that old fellow kiss you?" Before he left he said, "I'll send you some medicine, and you must shake it, because it will be very thick." It was dark coloured. He sent eight bottles altogether. I never smelt anything like it before. Miss Gardner complained of nausea when she took it, and was unable to take it all. I told him of this when the first bottle was being taken. He said, "You must insist upon her taking it." He afterwards changed it. She took two bottles and a half. In April he asked me if she complained of any pains. I said, "No; but the medicine made her worse." When I told him she could not take the medicine, he said, "Will you send her over to my surgery to-morrow, and if her father asks where she is, say she has gone a-shopping?" I said, "Very well," but I do not mean to send her. He called a day or two after, and said, "How is it you did not send Carry?" I replied "Carry did not want to come." I think she was present on one occasion when he spoke about going to his surgery, and she said she would not. He asked four times for her to be allowed to come to his surgery. One time he asked me to bring her over, and if the plaintiff said anything I was to say I was going a-shopping. He said if something was not done for her she would go off. He said if I would bring her over he would look to Carry, and that he would also look to me and my children. My children should be put into a school, educated and clothed, and be brought up like gentlefolks' children [sensation]. He sometimes called twice a week without ever having been sent for. The father knew of his visits as inquiring after the health of the family but he never knew of his desire to get Miss Gardner to the surgery. I remember witness coming in July, and examining her about dinner-time. [Witness corrobrated the girl's evidence with reference to this part of her examination.] He said she must be looked after or she would go off like her mother. The plaintiff, on hearing my voice, came out of his room, on which the defendant, who appeared confused, made the remark about her mother. I did not know the defendants object, and felt disgust, more than anything else, at his conduct. The girl was afterwards examined by Mr. Debenham, who said she was six or seven months ago in the family-way, and had some disease on her. I communicated to the father what had happened before going to Mr. Debenham. After Miss Gardner's confinement, I took the child away and put it out to nurse.—I never saw her make advances, or take improper liberties with any one." Cross-examined:—Sometimes bad language is used in the bar, but we stop it as soon as possible. She never came into the bar at night I told the father what the girl had informed me the defendant had done to her. The girl was dreadfully frightened at him, and I promised her I would follow him wheresoever he came again, and that he should do no harm to her.

SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

Mrs. Lavinia Spratt's cross-examination continued: I had not quarrelled with the plaintiff's son shortly before Miss Gardner went to Finsbury-square. I had had a few words with him about business. I cannot recollect whether, when Mr. Gardner accused Mr. Godfrey of being the father of the child, he also accused him of having given Miss Gardner medicine to procure miscarriage. I don't recollect Mr. Gardner saying, "I have kept the medicine." I will swear I did not say, "Pray, sir make some effort; hush it up," or words to that effect. I forgot out the man who drove the cab from Finsbury-square. His name is Taylor. The man has left Mr. Godfrey's service—he was glad to leave.

His Lordship: I thought it was a hack cab.—Mr. Chambers: Yes; but it was Mr. Godfrey's own horse, and his servant drove it.

Witness: I have spoken to Taylor since but not about this matter. I never said to Mrs. Brunsden or to anybody that we wanted Taylor's evidence, and would give him two guineas if he would come to Mr. Gardner's. I never called myself "Mrs. Smith. I did not call at Mr. Godfrey's surgery in the present month. I called eight times for his bill for attending Mrs. Gardner. I did not say, "If Mr. Godfrey will settle the matter he knows of and pays from £100, to £300, by four o'clock this evening, there shall be nothing more about it." I did not give my name as Smith. All I said was, "I have come for the bill."—Re-examined by Mr. James: I never was at Mr. Godfrey's after this action was brought. The only time I have ever seen Mr. Godfrey since was in the street, and he shook his head at me. The first time I went for the bill I saw Mr. Godfrey himself. He sent his assistant to tell me to wait in the back room till he came.—By his lordship: The mother was very ill for a long time. The girl attended her, no one else. The mother was very careful about her.

Mr. H. Gardner examined by Mr. Barnard: I am the plaintiff's son. I am seventeen years old. I finished my education at the University of Heidelberg, in Germany, in 1855. Since then I have served in the bar of my father's house. My sister was never allowed to go into the bar. She never served any customers. I have known the defendant several years. In January 1858, I went with my sister to a ball at the London tavern. Mr. Godfrey gave us the tickets. He left us at the door of the London tavern, and promised to meet us at twelve o'clock, but did not do so. In August I was sent by my father with a message for Dr. Godfrey to come to the Black Bull. Cross-examined by Mr. Chambers: I had no quarrel with my father on the morning when my father went to Finsbury-square. I had differences with my father once or twice, and once he sent Dr. Godfrey to speak to me. I do not know that Mrs. Spratt had made a complaint against me. She sometimes complained of me for smoking and reading in the bar later than twelve. I recollect sleeping in the same room with my mother during the alterations. I don't remember my mother being attended on in the night. —By his lordship: All my father complained of me was smoking and reading in the bar, and inattention to business.

Mr. Horace Debenham, examined by Mr. James: I am in practice as a general practitioner in Commercial-road. I examined this girl on the 4th August. I discovered that she was affected with a certain disease. I, Mr. King, appointed by Mr. James: I am a surgeon at Eltham. I attended this girl in her confinement, on the 10th of October. It was a male child. I examined the child, and found spots on it, which showed that the mother was affected with a certain disease. There was another disease which would show similar symptoms. I attended the child for six weeks, and had great difficulty in saving its sight.

This was the plaintiff's case.

Mr. M. Chambers addressed the jury for the defendant, and said that he could assure them that he never felt greater anxiety in any case than he laboured under in this one. It was not a question of £200, or £300, or even £50,000, that was at stake for his unfortunate client, for he was a medical man who for years had been in practice, and maintained a pure and honorable character. After the medical evidence which had been given, he had no doubt that the jury would return verdict for the defendant, when they had heard his evidence. He had been married only a few months at the time when he was charged with committing this abominable offence; and at that time it would be proved that in mind and person he was pure. The disease mentioned was one that was hardly ever eradicated from the blood of a person once affected with it, and it was communicated from parent to offspring, so that the sins of the father were visited upon the children. The defendant had since his marriage had a child born, and that child was perfectly free from any disease, so that it was clear he could not have affected with the disease which had shown itself in Miss Gardner's child. The learned counsel then commented at length upon the utter improbability of the story told by the plaintiff's daughter, and stated that the defendant would be placed in the witness-box, and would entirely deny the truth of the evidence which had been given.

Mr. Debenham was recalled by his lordship and said: I found no trace of disease when I examined the girl. I did not examine her for constitutional disease but there were no primary symptoms. I believe that the copper coloured spots on the child showed that its father had had disease.

His lordship, after consulting with the learned counsel, said to the jury that he had suggested that the girl should during the progress of the cause, be examined by a medical man of eminence to see if there were any primary or secondary symptoms. There could be no doubt that the infant bore marks of disease, but the girl had shown none since.

Mr. Sergeant Ballantine requested that the defendant should be examined; Dr. Coulson was also sent for and told by his lordship what was desired, but he expressed his opinion that such an examination would be now probably useless.

Mr. John Gilbey examined by Mr. Sergeant Ballantine: I am a member of the College of Physicians in Edinburgh, and I have a diploma as physician and surgeon at Glasgow, dated in 1843. Until lately I have practised as a general practitioner. I married on the 26th of March twelve month. Since then I have lived with my wife in Finsbury-square. I have never had disease primary or secondary. My wife knew I attended the Gardners. My wife knew that Miss Gardner sang. On January 15th I called on Mrs. Gardner at half-past two o'clock. Mrs. Gardner could hardly speak. She was lying on the sofa. She appeared very excited and agitated, independently of her disease. I was requested on that day to speak to the son. I had been sent for. Mr. Gardner asked me if I would take Miss Gardner to the surgery, and let her stay till the disturbance was over. I said I could not for there was nobody there. I said I would take her to Finsbury-square. I called for her at four o'clock. I took her to Finsbury-square but I stopped for five minutes a Spitalfields market to see a patient. When I got to Finsbury-square I heard there was a message for me to go and see Mrs. Bennett. I told Norah, the servant, to call Mrs. Godfrey, and she did so. I was not alone with Miss Gardner, except in the cab. I did not kiss her in the house. I took no liberty of any kind with her in the cab. I returned home at half-past seven. They were sitting at table. There were a daughter of a colonel and a daughter of a barrister there. I had dinner. I was not alone with the girl. I took her home about nine. On the way home in the cab I called on Mrs. Solomons, a patient. I have tried since and found that driving fast it takes four minutes to drive to the plaintiff's and seven minutes at the ordinary rate. I took her to her father's house, and not to my surgery. I took no liberty of her in the cab. I never touched her in any way. I went to see my patients at Mount-place, and never saw the plaintiff's daughter that night again. I never heard her play the piano during January or February. I never called her to me. I never was with her alone all January or February. When she was a child I might have kissed her, but I do not remember having done so. I was called to see her on the 3rd of May. Her name is in my book as having been seen and prescribed for on that day. I was sent for. Spratt came for me; it was on the 30th April. I was told not to be in a hurry, but to go when I could. Mr. Gardner told me that Carry was not quite right. He said he was afraid her chest was bad. He said he had heard from Mrs. Spratt that she was not right. I asked for Mrs. Spratt, and she came up on the top of stairs.

Dr. Coulson, who was anxious to get away, was at this course of the proceedings sworn. He said: I have examined the girl as well as I could. I find no symptoms of disease. I find an unhealthy symptom, but I cannot undertake to say that is the result of impure intimacy. There was another disease which might have been mistaken for that which had been described. I think I could state positively that this girl has never had primary disease. As to the spots on the infant, I cannot give an opinion without seeing it. I am not able to say whether such a disease ever passes over one generation and affects the next.

Dr. Coulson then retired from the court and examined the defendant, and having done so, said: I find no trace of disease in him.

Mr. Godfrey's examination continued: On the stairs I listened to Miss Gardner's chest. Her dress was never undone in any way. I never touched her indecently. I detected a little wheezing in her chest.—Mrs. Spratt told me that there was something else the matter with her, I ordered her medicine, which is entered in my book by my assistant. He has since enlisted as a soldier. It is a proper medicine for her complaint. Some of the entries of medicine are in another person's writing, and some in mine. The medicine would not produce miscarriage. The latest date of the medicine is the 28th of May. The medicine was a weak preparation of iron and wine, afterwards with some bark. There was also a mild aperient, salts, liquorice, and peppermint. I never examined her after the 3rd of May. About the 3rd of August I went to Mr. Gardner for my account. I did not, however, in fact, ask for my bill though I had intended to do so. I never told Mrs. Spratt to send the girl to my surgery and say she had gone shopping. It is a fiction. I have never promised to provide for Mrs. Spratt's children. On the 8th or 9th of August I went to Mr. Gardner's in consequence of a message. I went to Worship-street police-court on the subject of what had occurred at Mr. Gardner's. I spoke to Mr. Hartston, the clerk, on the matter. When I saw Mr. Gardner he was sitting down. He said, "I suppose you know what I have sent for you about?" I said, No, what is it?" He then charged with what has been already stated, and alluded to what was said to have occurred in the cab." I said it is false; where is she? bring her here; the dare not my so?" He said, "I shall not." I then said, "You villan, you're a monster; you have trumped up this charge to get rid of a report that is in every house in the neighborhood about you and your family. He said, "What report; who told you? I told him what I had heard charged against himself and daughter, and where I had heard it. Spratt said, "What a horrid lie." He said, "What proof have you?" "You gave my daughter medicine to make her miscarry. I have kept it." I said "Everything I have given has been entered on my book, and sent and compounded by my assistant. I said "I would indict him and transport him."—Mrs. Spratt said, "You had better not you had better settle it." I went up to Gardner and said, "You villain, if you were not blind I would strangle you." I went from the house straight to Worship-street police-court. I had in point of fact heard a report, but I did not believe it.—I did not know that the girl was in the condition described. When I heard the report I said it was not so. I had seen her five or six days before.—Cross-examined by Mr. James: I saw her and her father coming out of the bedroom. I still swear I never kissed that girl in 1857 after she came from school. I don't remember having kissed her since she was a child. The mother never spoke to me about it. I never told my wife that I was going to take a little girl home. My wife was a little surprised. She did not quite like it. I never asked for her to go to Finsbury-square. I knew a little girl named Jane Marshall. I have never been indicted with her. I never kissed her. I never gave her a sticking-plaster.

Mr. James: Let the child be brought into court. She was brought in and identified.

Mr. Godfrey: I swear I never gave her a smelling-bottle. I gave her mother a smelling-bottle, but not for the girl. I have never driven with the girl alone to Epping forest since I was married. I did once before my marriage. She was not so young as fifteen or sixteen. When the plaintiff's daughter was in the cab she was dressed like a child, as if she were going to a party. I was never charged with attempting to violate a child. The notorious Louisa Harrison, who since charged two other men, charged me with assaulting her. She had previously charged a waggoner. The charge against me was dismissed. She was a patient of mine. She said it was committed in a room at the back of the surgery. It was in 1840 or 1843. Harrison was about eighteen. I know Mrs. Lewis. She never charged me with improperly acting towards her in a cab. I went with her in a cab when I fetched her to attend wife's confinement. I never had any such charge made, nor did I hear of it until this moment. When the plaintiff complained of his son, he said, "My son is a villain, he will drive me mad." When I was served with this writ, I told the person who brought it that there was a horrible report about Gardner and his daughter. I was in a great passion.

Mrs. Godfrey examined by Mr. Brown: I am the defendant's wife. I have been married a year and ten months. We have a child, which was born on the 15th of March last. My husband has had no disease since I married him. I remember Caroline Gardner coming to Finsbury-square. I was at home all the time. There were two other ladies there. Miss Gardner was not left alone while she was there.—[The witness was very much affected whilst giving her evidence.] Mr. Godfrey had no opportunity of being alone with the girl. —Cross-examined by Mr. Barnard; I had not seen Miss Gardner before my husband brought her to Finsbury-square. I did not know she was coming. She brought music and she sung one song. About the time of the 15th of January I and my husband slept in one bed. I had no medical attendant during my confinement except my husband. There were three in the house but I did not see them.—Re-examined: My baby is a boy. It has been in good health ever since it was born. It has had no blotches or anything of the kind. I had an objection to any medical man attending me except my husband. I have had no disease since my marriage.—To his lordship: my husband never takes luncheon. I am quite sure that on the day when Gardiner was at my house I did not get my husband any luncheon. My husband never said anything about Miss Gardner coming to sing at Finsbury-square. I saw that she had some music, and I asked her to sing. There were two young ladies sleeping in the house at the time, and there was no place where Miss Gardner could have slept if she had stayed.

Mrs. Dix, examined by Mr. Chambers: I was servant to Mr. Godfrey when this young person was brought there. They came to the hall, and Mr. Godfrey went away directly. He returned about nine. I never saw Mr. Godfrey with Miss Gardner alone.

Miss Ballantine examined by Mr. Sergeant Ballantine: I am daughter of Colonel Ballantine. I was on a visit to Mr. Godfrey, when Miss Gardner came. Mr. Godfrey, in the passage introduced her to Mrs. Godfrey. There was nothing said about Mrs. Godfrey being out whilst she was standing behind the door.

Abraham Taylor examined by Mr. Sergeant Ballantine: I drove Miss Gardner in the cab to Dr. Godfrey's house. After Miss Gardner had got out of the cab at Finsbury-square, it was more than an hour before Dr. Godfrey got in again. I afterwards drove him to Union-street. I drove Dr. Godfrey and Miss Gardner home to Whitechapel at night. She was also in the cab when I drove Dr. Godfrey to Union-Street. [The witness seemed to have a very imperfect recollection of what had occurred.]—Cross-examined by Mr. Barnard: I have on several occasions driven Dr. Godfrey with young ladies in the cab. I don't recollect it being after dark. It might be.

His lordship said the questions should be pointed to some occasion. Dr. Godfrey might have driven with his own relatives with perfect propriety.

Witness: I know Mrs. Lewis, but not Miss Davis.—By his lordship: The young ladies whom I have driven in the cab were very respectable; they were relatives. I have never seen improper conduct by Dr. Godfrey with females in his cab.

At this stage of the proceedings the court adjourned.

THIRD DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

On his lordship taking his seat, Mr. Barnard said he had heard with regret that Mr. Edwin James, his learned leader, had lost his voice, and in consequence was absent, and that even if he were present he would not be able to address the jury upon the whole case for the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, his client was considering whether he should not withdraw the record; but it was hoped that he would not be forced to adopt such a course, and that some arrangement might be made for the further hearing of the cause.—Mr. Chambers, after what had occurred on the previous day, declined to consent to any delay.

The Lord Chief Justice agreed that in a case of such immense importance, there would be great inconvenience in pressing on the case in the absence of Mr. James. He had himself felt embarrassment under such circumstances, and could fully appreciate the position of Mr. Barnard, but what could he do if postponement was opposed?—Mr. Chambers said his client was under a fearful imputation, and did not wish to rest upon it.

Mr. Barnard regretted that Mr. James had unfortunately lost the voice and was unable to proceed with the case.—The Lord Chief Justice: But might we to proceed the case because Mr. James had lost his voice?—Mr. Barnard (in haste): Oh, no.

A juryman said that the jury thought it was necessary that the case should be adjourned, in order that justice might be done. —Mr. Chambers hoped that a gentleman who was charged with such a frightful crime, as he might call it, would have his case tried out properly.

The Lord Chief Justice: But would the case be properly tried if the plaintiff's leading counsel was absent?—Mr. Chambers said he would agree to forego the speeches on both sides.

The Lord Chief Justice: But would that be just to the judge and jury?—Mr. Chambers: This application was made at the last moment, when circumstances had almost miraculously transpired in favour of the defendant.

The Lord Chief Justice: That need not now be referred to. He would not throw out the most distant expression of opinion in reference to the case; yet he must say that, whichever way it went, it was very desirable to know that everything had been done. He should be very much guided by the feelings of the jury.—Several of the jurymen agreed with his lordship as to the propriety of everything possible being done. The foreman: They felt that they were doing a most responsible duty; and for himself he would not have been in the box for £100, nor for £500 either, and he would give that sum to be relieved from the duty of trying the case.

The Lord Chief Justice: The case had better be adjourned. He would, of course, take into consideration the other engagements of the learned counsel for the defendant.—Mr. Chambers said his engagement to his client was fixed and determined. If the case were adjourned, let it be until to-morrow; for he had all to-day to return briefs and make any other necessary arrangements.

A juryman thought it would be more convenient if the adjournment were until Thursday.—Mr. Barnard, however, said that that would be a most unfortunate arrangement; for Thursday was appointed the polling day for Marylebone (a laugh.)

The Lord Chief Justice: Then let the adjournment be until to-morrow. After some discussion this course was adopted; but it was arranged that a witness or two for the defendant, who were in attendance, should be called at once.

Mr. James soon afterwards entered the court, and, in a hoarse voice, expressed his sincere regret that any inconvenience should have arisen from his absence. He expected when he made his arrangements that this cause would have been over before three o'clock on Tuesday. This cost was one of great importance to his client, but still he hoped that Mr. Barnard would have felt himself competent to do justice to it.

The following evidence was given:—

Mrs. Brunden was called to contradict the evidence of Mrs. Spratt, in reference to a conversation on the 12th of February last. Mrs. Spratt had denied that the conversation ever took place.—Mr. Barnard objected to the evidence, and his lordship rejected it upon the ground that it referred only to a collateral issue.—The evidence was not pressed, nor was that of John Briant, who was to have been called for a similar purpose.

Dr. Rowe said he had been an army surgeon, and had served in the Peninsula. He had looked at the prescriptions for medicine given by Dr. Godfrey to Miss Gardner. It was medicine proper for females under certain circumstances. He had examined Dr. Godfrey most minutely, and if he had had disease he thought he could have found traces of it. There was no such trace. Witness had had great experience in such matters.

George Poole: I used the Black Bull.—I have frequently seen Miss Gardner serving there. I have been served by her.—I took notice of her serving there whilst the house was being altered, about Christmas-day, 1857.—Cross-examined by Mr. James: I have seen her at all hours, up to one in the morning. I have no doubt I saw her serving in August and September, 1857.

Mr. James: Then they have not told you that she was at a boarding-school all that time?—Witness: I do not know. I am no scholar. I swear she has served me with all sorts of liquors. My taste varies (a laugh). The last time she served me was on a Friday night, about Christmas, when it thundered and lightened till early Saturday morning (a laugh). I stayed there till six in the morning. I keep a stall and I deals in cheap and glass, and sell by auction similar like (laughter). I was formerly in the navy, but I was not there in the name of Cadogan. I gave my own name.—Mr. James: Did you desert from the navy?—Witness:

Wm. Turner: I am a porter at the Eastern Counties Railway. I have gone to the Black Bull lately—the last week—Mike Gardner served me and other customers last Saturday week. This was between half-past seven and eight.—Cross-examined: I had stirred up with a glass of peppermint. She served my cousin, not me.—I was subpœnaed last Tuesday.

The case was again adjourned.

FOURTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The jury attended on Wednesday morning for the fourth time, for the purpose of trying this case. Public excitement seemed to have increased as the trial approached its termination; there were many more people surrounding the approaches to the court than on any former occasion, and it was necessary to have a large number of policemen in attendance to prevent the crowd from entirely blocking up all access to the court.

Mr. Bernard, for the plaintiff, said he proposed to call a Mr. Fuller, to reply, to contradict the defendant, who said in cross-examination that he had heard a report at Mr. Fuller's and Mr. Beawell's, respecting Miss Gardner and her own father. The contradiction was strictly relevant to the issue, and should therefore, he submitted, be laid before the jury.

The Lord Chief Justice thought it would be right first to ask Mr. Godfrey from whom he had heard the report. Mr. Godfrey was called, and asked by his Lordship from whom he heard the report. He said that first he heard it from a woman named Mingay, and afterwards from Mr. Beawell, who was a patient of his. He heard from Mr. Mingay that Mr. Fuller had said so, and afterwards asked Mr. Fuller, before a witness, whether what Mingay said was true, and he said it was not.

The Lord Chief Justice said he thought it would come to that, and not that Mr. Fuller had himself propagated the report. He had not understood that Mr. Godfrey said he had heard it from Mr. Fuller.

Mr. Bernard then said he would call Mr. Beawell. The defendant had said he had heard the report from him. Mr. Beawell was called, and said he was a publican at Baker's Row, Whitechapel, and knew the defendant. It was true that some months ago he had a conversation with the defendant, but no name was mentioned. Dr. Godfrey came to his house, and, to the best of witness's belief, said that a neighbour of witness's was in the condition alluded to.

The Lord Chief Justice said this was not exactly a contradiction—the defendant had said it had been mentioned openly in Mr. Beawell's shop. Mr. Beawell, in answer to a question, said it was mentioned at the bar of his house.

The Lord Chief Justice—Could there be any doubt, after this, that there was some such report, however unfounded, for such reports would not about without the slightest foundation?

Mr. M. Chambers then summed up the defendant's case, and urged upon the attention of the jury the fact that throughout the whole case the defendant's counsel had never been free from evidence that took them by surprise; but singularly enough, every bit of evidence that had come upon them by surprise, confirmed the words he made use of when he first addressed them; that every new and unforeseen incident tended to elicit the truth, and to exhibit the innocence of Dr. Godfrey. And even this last piece of evidence, that he in his natural anxiety at first objected to, lest something might be introduced to affect the minds of the jury with prejudice—even this piece of evidence confirmed Dr. Godfrey's sincerity, his candour, and his truth. He himself, Dr. Godfrey, and every one had struggled to avoid introducing to their attention the horrible report that happened to be in the mouths of the neighbourhood; and now, for the purpose of contradicting Dr. Godfrey, Mr. Beawell had been produced, and he said, with perfect frankness and sincerity, that in substance what Dr. Godfrey had said was true. The learned counsel then addressed the jury, for the purpose of shewing that it was anatomically impossible that the offence with which Dr. Godfrey was charged, could have been committed under the circumstances deposed to Miss Gardner. He also drew their attention to the numerous contradictions which existed between her statement of what took place at Finsbury-square and the statements of Mrs. Godfrey, Miss Dalmadine, and the servant girl. Strange enough, there were similar extraordinary circumstances in reference to the occasion on which the offence was said to have been a second time committed. There were the workmen about the house; there was the brother, an active young man; the father not far off; the sick mother in an adjoining room, and the unfastened door. Could they, with these circumstances, believe what Miss Gardner had stated? Then, as to the medicine which the defendant had administered to her. At first, no doubt the administering medicine raised the darkest suspicion in their minds; but yet, now it is turned out, by the production of Dr. Godfrey's books, that the medicines given were perfectly proper for a young female in that peculiar state of health in which Dr. Godfrey said that Miss Gardner was. The learned counsel also commented at length upon the freedom from all disease of Dr. Godfrey, and the impossibility that he could, under these circumstances, be the father of Miss Gardner's child, which he contrasted with what he called the "bouncing, blooming baby" of Mrs. Godfrey, which, if there was another baby show, would be likely enough to take the prize. He concluded an elaborate speech by appealing to them to restore Dr. Godfrey to that good name and position which he occupied previous to this horrible accusation being made; and he asked them solemnly, if they found their verdict for the plaintiff, how could they reconcile their consciences to it hereafter.

Mr. Bernard (in the absence of Mr. Edwin James), addressed the jury, in reply, for the plaintiff, and assured them that it was with the most painful anxiety that he rose to address them in this case, and that he never felt fully the responsibility that rested upon a member of the bar until he found himself called on unexpectedly in reply upon this evidence. It was a duty from which an older member of the bar might have shrunk. That duty, however, was cast upon him, and he was quite sure that he should not appeal in vain to their very patient and kind indulgence during the time which it would be necessary for him to address them. He should have liked that his learned friend Mr. James, in justice to the plaintiff, to his daughter, and to his son, should have answered his address in addressing them. He should have liked him, with the power which he could impart, brought to bear to prove that the statement made by the witness Mingay, which his learned friend had stated to be false, was false. He should have liked to have heard the witness Mingay, and to have had the opportunity of cross-examining him, and of commenting on the verdict of the jury, if they had found Dr. Godfrey guilty. He (Mr. Bernard) would not, for one moment, suppose that the jury who ordered Caroline Grainger to stand up down to her knees stamped with infamy and disgrace, and execrated by every person who felt the highest regard for decency and truth. The same observation applied to the father and to her brother, for the war is death, even there, between such characters and the virtuous. He should have liked that his learned friend would excuse the father or the brother of Miss Gardner of being the father of the child.

Mr. Chambers—Certainly not.

Mr. Bernard—And he knew not whether Dr. Godfrey had made up his mind to charge the father or the brother with this act. If the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, they would say by that verdict that the father or the brother was the guilty man.—Let them see who the plaintiff was. He was a man suffering from blindness, and had been for four or five years; and he had conducted the business of a publican in the same house for twenty-three years. He did not know if it was intended to cast any stigma on his character on account of the kind of business which he was occupied in, but he was sure that he would pay no regard to that. He had succeeded his father in the business—it was a profitable business—and he had realised property in it. It was said that the house was open late, and that there were prostitutes at the bar; but there must be great difficulty in any person conducting such a business without complaint; and yet, during the twenty-three years, there had only been three complaints against the plaintiff, two of which were dismissed, and on the third occasion there was a nominal fine of 1s. What had been his conduct to his family? He had two children, and his desire had been to bring them up to occupy respectable positions in society; and, indeed, if there had been any mistake in his manner of bringing them up, it was not that he had neglected them, that he had permitted them to remain uneducated; but if there was any complaint it was that he had too highly educated his children. The learned counsel then went into the details of the case, and alluded to the strange circumstances of a doctor in Finsbury-square taking home the daughter of a publican in Whitechapel, and suggested that he would not have done so except with some improper motive. As to the improbabilities in Miss Gardner's statement, there was this remark, that if it had been a trumpeted-up case, she would have taken care not to have stated such improbabilities, but would have given a plain and probable account of the matter. He concluded by saying that he knew that he had very imperfectly performed his duty, but the jury would have the benefit of having their attention directed by his lordship to such parts of the evidence as he thought material in order to do justice between these parties. He would not ask for their anxious and serious attention to the case, for they had already given it, and would, he knew, give it until they arrived at a conclusion. He left the case with them, in the hope that the truth itself would be made clear to their minds, and that the matter would not be determined on observations made by counsel. He trusted that the powerful address of his friend would have no effect whatever on their minds, and that they would divest themselves of every prejudice and every influence that could pervert their judgment, and that they would consider the evidence itself, and that alone. Although the issue was a fearful one, whether they found their verdict for the plaintiff or the defendant, he trusted that on a careful consideration of the evidence, and of all the circumstances of this case, they would find that they could not resist returning a verdict for the plaintiff. And he need not tell them that if there was a verdict for the plaintiff, it should be with such ample damages as would afford the only compensation which could be given for a grievance and an injury of this kind.

The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up, said,—Gentlemen of the Jury, I am quite sure that it is unnecessary to invite your anxious attention to this case. A more remarkable case, or one more requiring the anxious attention of a jury, has never fallen within the range of my somewhat extensive experience. This case presented to you on the part of the plaintiff is one of the most frightful description. You have the case of a young girl, under the age of fifteen years, debauched, unquestionably, by some one, and if the defendant be the man to whom this foul act is to be ascribed, the case is one of unparalleled atrocity. The features of the case are shocking. A fabricated accusation of blindness, a mother on the bed of death, a young girl hardly emerging out of childhood into puberty, whose childlike beauty would have insured her protection against outrage from anybody who had the feelings of a man, and whose immature years would have rendered her an object of desire only to one of the most depraved and vitiated appetite. If the defendant be the man, then these additional circumstances of atrocity. He was admitted into the bosom of this family by virtue of that confidence which is placed in the members of a noble profession, and which we may hope and believe it rarely happens, is abused. And, in addition to this, if the defendant is conscious in his own heart and soul that he is the man who did this deed, then you have circumstances of the most grievous character, in the shape of a charge of conspiracy and perjury against those whom he had so deeply injured. But the more fearful the magnitude of the charges involved in the case for the plaintiff and the defendant, the more imperatively important does it become that you should weigh every part of this case with the utmost caution and the most anxious attention. You will look at the probabilities, as well as the evidence on each side, and will only come to the verdict—which, whatever way you pronounce it, involves the most fearful and painful consequences to the party against whom it is pronounced—upon the most careful consideration. The case for the plaintiff may be stated in a few words. His wife was on her death-bed, ill of decline, without hope of recovery, and the defendant, as a medical gentleman, was in attendance upon her. At Christmas, last year, his daughter, who was then four or five months short of fifteen years old, came home from school for the holidays. The plaintiff's witnesses represent to you that the defendant, struck with the beauty of the girl, conceived the intention of seducing her; and with that purpose he proposed to the mother to allow the girl to visit his wife for a fortnight, saying that his wife had heard she sang. It is said that on this the mother asked if he wanted to kill her by taking her child away for a fortnight? that the defendant thereupon, abandoning the larger invitation, asked for her to come for a night. The mother said she had never been allowed to sleep away from home except at school; and when she declined to allow her to go for a night, he asked for her to come for an hour or two. The mother said, "If you get her father's permission, you have mine." His brother then went through the ordinance, and commented at considerable length upon the exceeding improbability of that story, told by Miss Gardner and the plaintiff themselves; and also adverted to the fact that Dr. Godfrey was free from disease. According to the medical testimony, if Dr. Godfrey therefore is innocent of the offence with which he is charged, this disease from the supposition that he has fallen to the ground. His brother concluded—Rumour had said that this unfortunate plaintiff was the father of the child; and I can much relieved when, in the course of this morning, I received from you, gentlemen, a written declaration of your satisfaction that you were not prepared to entertain such a supposition. Though the clearest evidence, one would not fix upon a man the charge of running counter to the first instincts of his nature; and one cannot suppose that a man blind, and therefore incapable of being led away by that beauty which might render his girl an object of desire to others, could be induced to give way to the unnatural and pitiable suggestion of debauching his own daughter. That is, in truth, no ground for such a supposition; or anything of the kind, as effecting the father or the brother. But for this suspicion that has given to this case a degree of painful interest that it would not have otherwise obtained, the matter would not have been of so extremely serious a character. But it does not follow that, because both these persons to whom public suspicion appears groundlessly to have attached are innocent, that Dr. Godfrey is necessarily not the author of this seduction. As to the character of the plaintiff's house, I think that that was pressed a great deal further than it ought to be, for the plaintiff seemed to be a man who was anxiously desirous for his children's welfare. There remains the question, whether this girl may not have formed some other acquaintance; for we hear of medical students and others using this house, and the question is, whether some of these persons may not have formed an unfortunate connection with her. She may have fabricated an unfounded story, and deceived her father, and there is just the possibility—and I only put the supposition because one is anxious to look at every view of the case—that the defendant, without being answerable to the full extent that he is charged, may have forgotten himself with the girl in the cab, or in the room; and then when she found herself in a scrape with somebody else she turned it on him. He may possibly have kissed her on the stairs as Lavinia Spratt says he did; and then, when it turned out that she was in the family-way, Spratt and the father having fixed on the defendant as the guilty person, the girl may have, from sinister motives to protect some one else, or from a desire not to acknowledge to a full extent her own misdeeds, fixed on the defendant. These are matters worthy of your consideration. It does not follow, because the defendant is not the father of this child, that there must be conspiracy on the part of the plaintiff and Mrs. Spratt and the girl; for it may only be this, that the girl had not spoken the truth when she said that she never was intimate with any other man. I cannot help telling you that charges of this kind are sometimes trumped up and supported by young girls whom you would have supposed to be entirely incapable of such deception and crime. Before you come to the conclusion that a man has been guilty of such a thing, you ought to be perfectly satisfied that the case is a trustworthy and reliable one. If, on the other hand, this young girl has been sacrificed by the defendant, it is important the father should have the only redress that he can have; and it is most important that society should be protected against acts of this kind, by which young persons, hardly capable of knowing what they are about, hardly capable in point of law, and certainly not in point of morality, of assenting to what is proposed to be done to them, are seduced. At the same time, you must bear in mind that this is a charge easy to make, but difficult to disprove; and one in which the reputation of the defendant, the happiness of his wife and of his child, his position in society and in domestic life are at stake. I am sure you will give the matter your most serious consideration.

The jury retired to their private room at twenty minutes to four, and at half-past 6 they communicated in writing with his lordship, who ordered that they should be sent for, and they were accordingly brought into court.

The Lord Chief Justice said: You ask me, gentlemen, whether—if there be now existing in Miss Gardner's child—I rule that it must be held to have come direct from the father or mother? Understand that I am not ruling, in the sense of directing you as a matter of law, anything respecting that. I tell you that, according to the evidence as it now stands, it is proved that the child is tainted with the poison. It is proved by a witness, called by the plaintiff himself; and although the child is in the hands of the plaintiff, no attempt has been made to show that that evidence, given by the plaintiff's own witness, a surgeon, is incorrect. I, therefore, repeat—subject to your judgment, it being a matter entirely for your opinion, and not for mine—that I should strongly advise you not lightly to discredit the statement of the plaintiff's own witness, a gentleman of scientific knowledge—and which opinion the plaintiff has not sought to correct, although he had the child, and had ample opportunity of correction, if there were anything erroneous. If you start with the assumption that there exists in the child disease, you have the further evidence that there is no trace of such a thing in the mother. The evidence is that it must be derived from the father or from the mother, there being no authority for saying that it can be derived from any other person than the child's immediate progenitors. If it is not in the mother, and if you believe the medical testimony that it must have come from father or mother, then comes the question whether you are satisfied that there is no trace of it in the supposed father.

THE VERDICT.

The jury retired to their room again; but in the course of a few minutes they returned into court.

The Associate: Are you agreed upon your verdict, gentlemen?

The Foreman: Yes; we find for the defendant; but I am desired to say that we exculpate the father and the son from the calumnies that have been thrown upon them.

No sooner had the verdict been pronounced than a shout of applause burst from the people in court. In a moment they rushed tumultuously out; a loud hurrah from those outside rang through the building, and the cheering was taken up enthusiastically by the crowd in Guildhall-yard.

Thus ended this most remarkable trial.

CHARCOAL FOR HOGS AND OTHER ANIMALS.—One of the most simple and excellent medicines for any derangement of the stomach of human beings, is finely pulverised, fresh-burnt charcoal. For this purpose it should be closely corked up in a bottle as soon as it has been burnt and ground; a teaspoonful taken in a wine glass of water once a day will frequently be found beneficial, and worth more than all the quack nostrums with which the country is flooded.

But our object was to speak of the value of charcoal to domestic animals, particularly to fattening them. In the last part of it finely pulverised, sift mixed with corn meal and water to moderate dumpling, and twice a week; will be found extremely beneficial to fattening poultry, geese, ducks, &c. It may be given in the same way as recommended for swine. Fowls that have accidentally been confined for a long time where they had access to no food, except charcoal, when discovered, were found not only to have sustained themselves but to have actually fattened.—Valley Farmer.

ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY!

SEVEN PERSONS KILLED!

Several Wounded!

At half-past two o'clock on Saturday morning an accident occurred on the line of the Great Western Railroad, about a mile west of Dundas, which we regret to say, was attended by fatal consequence, in the instantaneous death of seven persons and the infliction of severe wounds and injuries on several others, from the effects of which it is hardly hoped that all can possibly recover.

Such a sight has rarely been known before. From about seven o'clock on Friday evening, the rain continued to pour down in torrents, and without intermission, till towards two o'clock, when it commenced snowing. The consequence was, that the water-courses of ordinary times were unequal to the conveyance and proper discharge of the continuous flood which everywhere flowed, as if the flood-gates of Heaven had been unloosed.

At the point where this sad casualty occurred, the track crosses a deep ravine, which had been filled in so that it was thought a solid embankment had been made, which nothing could disturb. The bottom, however, is of that peculiar formation composed of the debris from the hill-side close by, and the soil of which the embankment is composed is clean sand and fine gravel. It would seem that the water had collected in the hollow between the hill-side and the railroad embankment, from whence it had we should suppose, made its way through the bottom of the embankment. When once the water had thus made a passage way, the loose sand soon yielded before the flood, and a yawning chasm of about one hundred yards in length and from forty to fifty feet deep, was soon made, the earth being carried out bodily down the declivity below.

When the night express arrived at this point, it was fearfully dark, and no signs was afforded of the awfully dangerous pit-fall to which the train hurried on its way. In an instant the engine and tender leaped into the hole closely followed by the baggage car, an emigrant car, two first-class passenger cars, and a sleeping car. A fearful crash was the inevitable result, and to look upon the wreck one can only wonder how any person in either of the passenger cars escaped.

From Mr. Geo. W. Tifft of Buffalo, who was a passenger, our reporter learned that the train was coming down the grade at a rapid rate, though not behind time; but others who were on board affirm that at the time of the accident, the train was proceeding slowly. Mr. Tifft described the scene as awful in the last degree. Enveloped in darkness, the snow falling fast, and the wind blowing furiously, in an instant men, women and children were buried in the ruins of the train, the engine being underneath all, roaring terribly from its steam-pipes. Singular enough, however, the baggage man escaped, as did also the whole of the passengers in the first passenger car. It does not appear that these were any passengers in the emigrant car. The second first-class passenger car, however, was a complete wreck, and it was to those who occupied it that the fearful havoc of life and limb occurred.

At the depot at Dundas, we saw four dead bodies. The engine-driver, George Morgan, of London; a brakesman named William Milne; a passenger named Hiram Depew, Lieutenant from Dunnington, Duchy, who had a through ticket from that place to New York, and about twenty-four dollars in money, as well as a pocket book in which his name was written, and the name of the place in Germany from which he came originally. He was a short, thick-set man, about forty-five years of age. The other body was that of Mr. Alexander Braid, of Hamilton, formerly locomotive superintendent, of the Great Western. He had been to Sarnia, it appears, with a friend with whom he was in company, sitting at the forward part of the sleeping car; that corner of the car came into collision with the next passenger car which had been brought to a stand by the timbers of the trestle-work used in the formation of the embankment. An iron rod was thus displaced, that it caught Mr. Braid under the chin, and pressed so heavily upon his throat, that he died almost instantly. It was not without much difficulty that his body was removed, so firmly had he been pinioned to the fatal spot; but strange to say, his friend, who was close by him, as well as another gentleman, who was by his side escaped with some slight cuts. Mr. Braid was universally esteemed, as a man of amiable disposition and pious walk of life, and his untimely death will be mourned by a large circle of friends as well as by his widow and children.

Poor Morgan, the engine-driver, was terribly cut to pieces. He was a married man, and leaves, we regret to say, a large family in London. The fireman was badly scalded and otherwise so much hurt that he was not expected to recover. He has been removed to a tavern at Copetown, together with several others.

The sleeping car, as has already been said, did not go down into the hole, but such was its position, poised on the brink, the forward part dipping downwards, and the hind part nigh off the track, that the passengers who had taken refuge in it soon had to leave it, fearing that it would run down the embankment. When they left this last shelter they could do no better than take out the cushions and bedding, with which they made such a resting place as kept the women and children all the wet ground, and by using the blankets and bedclothes the men managed to protect them from the worst of the storm. A messenger was despatched for aid, but before he could get to Hamilton and send on help, some four hours had been spent under exposure to the pitiless storm. As soon as possible, however, the railroad officials despatched a locomotive with such accommodation for the sufferers as could be hastily procured.

Medical aid was also sent to the scene of the disaster, and every effort was made to relieve the suffering, and to forward others on their journey. The managing director, Mr. Brydges, and several of the directors were immediately on the spot, planning and contriving ways and means to realise the unfortunate position of the passengers on right on promptly. Some time must elapse before the railroad to the south can be repaired, but in the meantime, passengers will merely be subjected to the inconvenience of changing cars three.

Coroner McMahon had summoned a jury to investigate the circumstances before him at Dundas.

THE INQUEST.

About one o'clock Coroner McMahon, Dundas, empannelled a jury, and held an inquest on the bodies in the Dundas station freight house. After viewing the bodies, the jury proceeded to the scene of the accident, and afterwards adjourned to meet on Monday at two o'clock in the Town Hall.

The inquest was resumed accordingly before Coroner McMahon. Dr. Mullen, Copetown, and Mr. Bell, Hamilton, acted as associate coroners. The County Attorney, Mr. T. Robertson, was present, watching the proceedings on the part of the Crown. Mr. Irvine, solicitor to the Great Western, was present on behalf of the Company. C. J. Bridges, Esq., managing director of the Railway, was also in the room. There were a large number of persons in the body of the Hall, who appeared to watch the proceedings with great interest. After the Coroner had called over the names of the jury as follows:—J. M. Thornton, (Foreman,) J. D. Thomas, Isaac Latshaw, T. F. Brown, H. King, J. F. Quackenbush, T. Sheldrick, Hugh Moore, G. Clement, Adam Paxton, Aaron Ash, William Irvine, P. Bloomfield, and James Watson, they proceeded to view the body of the Rev. Mr. Fawcett, which was lying in the Methodist Church, and returned to take the following—

EVIDENCE.

HENRY STOKES, engineer of the pilot engine, said—I am engineer on the Great Western road. In the event of an engine coming to Hamilton with any defects, it is my duty to put any engine to the train and take it through to its destination. I was on the pilot engine, and left Hamilton at 10.20 p. m. to assist the Hamilton train to Copetown. We got to Copetown at 10.30, or a minute more or less. I remained till after the mail, or rather night express, passed. It passed about 2.05, on the morning of Saturday. I followed that train down the bank with my engine. I came on to where the accident occurred. The place where the accident took place is about four miles east of Copetown. The train passed me at the switch at Copetown, and was then going at the rate of six miles an hour. She had just started as the engine wooded at Copetown. As soon as the switchman opened the switch, I followed the train slowly down the grade. My average speed coming down would not average 12miles an hour. The rules are that a single engine shall not run over twenty miles an hour. I was within twelve miles an hour. I went slow, knowing the train was ahead. I lost sight of her almost immediately after she passed me. I suppose she must have been half way to Flamboro', before I got on the engine. I was keeping a good look out, and seeing a glimmering light a-head, I turned round to "my mate," the fireman, and said, "Good God, Bill, there is a light ahead." I immediately stopped the engine, and on coming near to the place I heard a voice call out "stop! stop!" I reversed the engine to stop her. I had not time to think much about what light it was. I was about 70 yards distant when I came to a stand-still. I sent my "mate," to see what was the matter, as I did not like to leave the engine. I said, "Get off Bill, and see what is the matter." He went down to see. He was not gone above five minutes when he returned and told me what was wrong. He said, "Good God, Harry, they are all down the bank!" I saw two gentlemen standing beside my engine. I asked them if they were hurt, and they replied that they were. I told them to get up on the engine, and I took them to Copetown. I went off the moment they got on. I went to try if I could send a message to Hamilton, but found the circuit on the telegraph was broke, the wires being broken, and that I could not telegraph. I called the station master, and told him what was the matter. I took two cars out, and went again to the accident and brought up several people. When I got back I found the people all up in the hotel, and ready to receive the wounded. I had told the station-master to rouse the medical men. I found some when I got back. I have travelled a good deal over the portion of the road reported to. I never noticed anything particular about that embankment, at least not at the particular spot where the accident occurred. The embankment extends from the Desjardines bridge to Copetown. It is all grade. I cannot say what the length of the portion of this particular embankment is. I thought it one of the best places on the road to run over. Below Dundas station a man has been stationed for some time, but I think his duty is to look after the embankment above. He gives us a "caution" signal as we pass the place. He is east of Dundas station. If there was danger he would stop us. There was a watchman at the place where the accident occurred. A man was stationed at the water tank about half a mile or close on a mile from where the accident took place. I cannot fix the distance exactly. I got to Copetown about 11 30, and had anything been wrong at the embankment I must have seen it or felt it as the engine passed over. A train left Hamilton after us and met the express at Copetown. It was a freight train. It would be about 1-10 on Saturday morning when she passed the spot.—She left Hamilton at 12 30, and stopped at Copetown. I did not speak to the engineer of the train that left Hamilton when he passed Copetown. The train we brought up had on 20 freight cars. My engine was first. I suppose they were loaded. When we went up it was not snowing at all. Our head light was shining brightly. In fact, I don't think there are any better on the continent. When the engine "sways" or swings to one side, we know that there is something wrong. The engine did not "sway" as we went up. The water was running down on all directions. The bank was like the overflow of a river. It was raining in torrents. It is not our business to know anything about culverts.

To the Foreman—I said I considered it one of the best places of the road. I do not remember any slip having taken place at this spot. I do not know that a large slip took place there about two years ago. I can only remark that I considered it a good bit of road. The gentlemen I took to Copetown came up the road towards me, and called out "stop! stop!" I had seen the light before that, and was nearly stopped when they came up. Three trains passed over that portion of the road previously to the express, within one hour and thirty minutes. It was impossible for the engineer on the Express to have seen the place it was so stormy. He must have been going at the rate of 20 miles an hour. We got plenty of time to go over the grades. I considered it as safe that I should not have been afraid to go at my speed on a wet night. The brakes don't take the field as on a dry night, and made no more comfort. I cannot tell what like the night was I have spoken about. It was not the "mail" red light. It appeared to be outside of it. I did last hear George Sturgeon deceased engineer whistle. I was on the North London, England for five and a half years before I came to this country. I was on embankment in Buckinghamshire, England five years, and it had been turfed or sodded over for years.

To a Juryman—I say distinctly when we entered the switch at Copetown there was a freight train ready to go out. She left on time. As a pilot engine we give way to every other.

To the Coroner—Embankments are generally sodded in the old country, but not always. The embankment in this instance was not sodded. I can give no opinion about sodding embankments. I always thought sodding was only for the look of the thing. I don't know any good it does. The embankment that gave way in the old country was on the North Western Railway a short distance from Wolverhampton. No accident occurred.

To a Juryman—I thought it my duty to go back immediately to Copetown for assistance, as my mate and I could do little ourselves, and we wanted further assistance.

To the Coroner—The reason that I lost sight of the express train's tail light was from the fact that she went round the curve after leaving Copetown.

ALPHUS PIKE—I have been about three years on the Great Western as an engineer. I left Hamilton on the evening of Saturday as driver of the freight train, at 12 30. I went up the grade about 10 miles an hour. I had eleven cars on. It was raining very hard when I left Hamilton. I got to Copetown at 1 15 a.m. I saw nothing particular about the embankment as we passed. It was all right. I never received any caution about it; I considered it was as good as any part of the grade. The embankment is about 35 feet in height. On such a night as that we could see down to the base of the embankment. I saw a little stream of water farther down the road, at the foot of the embankment.

To Mr. Bell—It was foggy and stormy on the night in question. I could see a-head about three or four cars. Had the embankment been shaken, or a portion of it fallen in, I must have felt it by a displacement of a rail or otherwise. Sleet was falling when I passed the place, and afterwards, when I got to Copetown, rain and sleet fell. The ground was quite white as I went west. I expect there was an outlet below there in the shape of a culvert. I have seen the water running down. No slide has taken place at this spot for over three years to my knowledge. That is the time I have been on the road. I was off for about two months about two years ago, with a broken arm. I did not speak to any one at Copetown at any time about the embankment. I was at Harrisburgh going west. There used to be a watchman stationed at the water tank west of Dundas station. I have not seen him for six or eight months. Before that he was there all the time. I have seen stones coming down the hill or mountain, and he was there to watch them. The water tank is three-quarters of a mile from where the accident occurred. He exhibited a signal ("caution") to me about twenty yards from the water tank. The water was running between the rails. I was standing on the right hand side, the side next the mountain, and saw no water running down or lodged at the base of the embankment. There are several places east of Dundas where the Company keep men to watch the stones which fall from the "mountain." If there had been water to carry away the embankment, it would have flooded Dundas. Twenty-five feet of the embankment was left standing. I think the frost occasioned the slip and the surface water coming in at the cracked parts. The bank fell away as if scooped. I think it was shaken as we passed over, and it fell shortly after. Had there been water to carry off the embankment, there would not have been three bushels of sand left. The lanes are quite dry all along the base of the mountain.—No water could have lodged between the embankment and "mountain." The watchman I refer to keeps near the water-tank.

JOHN BUTLER conductor of the last freight train going west over the road before the accident. We got to the embankment about 1,15 on Saturday morning. I always considered the embankment very safe. I have been five years and a half on the road on every kind of trains I have seen water coming down the "mountain" in a storm. I was not out of my car and did not see any water as we passed Harrisburgh. I was on the engine as we passed the embankment. I felt no jar as we passed, had it not been all right, I must have felt it. A [illegible] track laid on ties and not ballasted [illegible].

W. THIRD, [illegible]milton. I was on the Express on [illegible] question.—I was going from W[illegible] to Hamilton. I was in the second [illegible] passenger car. I was sitting on the left hand side of the car looking east in the back part of the car. I noticed nothing particular.—As we came down it was stormy. With others, I was looking out at the window when the accident took place. I was only slightly hurt, and tried to help the others. I escaped by the lower side of the car, which was partly lying over on its side.—I heard the engine crashing. I felt no fear, as we went all down at once. It was all over in a minute. I knew there was something wrong, but as it was all over in an instant, there was no time to think. I walked up to the top of the embankment afterwards. I did not look for water, as I was trying to get out the passengers.—When I got out, I did not find the sand very muddy. There was no water at all. I went part of the way down the embankment. There were some pools round about. There was no stream ran through the bank.

To the foreman.—There were about twenty passengers in the car I was in. I went to Copetown with several of the wounded. None of those in the car were dead. It was quite dark, so that I could not see distinctly. I went down the road a short distance, after coming from Flamboro', to the place of the accident, where I met a train, and leaped on. This train brought on the wounded. None of those who were severely wounded were in this car. I was so much confused and excited that I could hardly my distinctly what took place.

A Young American at Sebastopol.

The Submarine Company have raised six vessels whole, and the steamers Turk and Grasney. The Grasney has copper bodies which are worth $25,000 to cut up. They are now breaking her up and taking her engines to pieces. Since my arrival here, they have raised the Danube, another steamer. She is iron, and came up in two halves. The chain, in attempting to raise her, cut her entirely through. Her engines are valued at $20,000. They have also raised a 16 gun brig and two large schooners. Col. Gowan has now made a contract with the Russians to have all the property that he recovers, and he is to find all the powder and purchase it from the government at their price. This contract came in vogue last June, but was not signed until November 10th. The first was, that the government should have one-half of the property and find all the money. The price of powder here of the government is 10s. for 36 pounds. They have already used eight tons of powder upon the Grasney, and it will need to much more before she is all got up. The appearance of the ships upon reaching the surface, is simply enough, after their long sojourn in their muddy bed. The rats are all honeycombed, the decks are covered with mud to the depth of two feet, reels of rigging, spars, and ballast are scattered over the decks. The hatches in most cases are open, and the hold half full of mud, and muscles are clinging to every part but the copper. Many of the ships were burnt before sinking.

The method that the company have adopted for raising the vessels is by means of four large "caissons," with small steam engines of fifteen horse power upon each. Two of these caissons are stationed each side of the sunken ship, large chains are then passed under her keel leading up to the docks, or caissons; by opening a submerged valve these docks are sunk down their proper depth, and the chain is then hauled taut by aid of a steam-engine. The water is then pumped out and the docks commence rising, and the engine at the same time at work produces a draft of no ordinary kind. But the experience of last summer has convinced them that there is not power enough to raise the large ships, as at present, under the direction of Capt. S. Bolbrook, the company are constructing two other large ones, which will be completed next spring. With the aid of these they expect to raise large ships of eighty guns.

Before I close, I will say a few things about places of note around here, which are familiar names to all of you. I several times visited the far-famed Malakoff. To the summit of the hill it is about 150 feet. The ground is all dug up with trenches from base to summit. The remains of the tower are still standing. Near to the Malakoff is the Redan, which is nothing more than a broad deep trench; here and there are sunken pits that cover the gallant dead; all around the ground is strewed with pieces of skulls, and the other day, as I was walking alone upon the edge of 'Victoria Battery,' I saw the place where the jackals had dug out the skeletons of six Englishmen, which had been buried by part of the battery sliding upon them. I packed up the skull of one, and intend to send it home from Constantinople. I have also been to Inkerman and Balaclava. There have been a great number of accidents here from the bursting of shells; some twenty men and women have been killed the past year. A young Englishman, belonging to the steamer Bryant, which put in here last spring, with some of his shipmates, was walking over the Black Bastion, and picked up a shell, with the intention of taking it home with him, but finding it too heavy, he threw it down, when it exploded, killing him instantly. A part of Tartars had kindled a fire around the round shot, as they supposed, and had placed their kettle of rice upon them, when one of them, being a shell, exploded, killing and scalding a number of them. A few days ago, a party of Russians were engaged weighing old bombs, for shipment, when all of a sudden one of them exploded, cutting one man in a frightful manner. This occurred within twenty yards of our machine-shop.—Private Letter from Sebastopol.

Great Windfall!

A PENITENTIARY CONVICT HEIR TO A FORTUNE AND A TITLE!

The Lockport (N. Y.) Advertiser has a story of a young man confined in the Erie County Penitentiary having fallen heir to an immense estate and a title, as follows:—"Some two weeks since, a young man of gentlemanly address, and who from appearance bore evidences of having seen better days, arrived at Tonawanda, and calling at the house of Mr. Browning, of that place, begged for something to eat, and asked for a situation. He gave a history of his circumstances as follows:—He said his father was wealthy, lived in France, and that he left his home in that country on a pleasure trip to the United States, bringing with him $63,000 for spending money and other purposes. On landing in New York, and after sojourning in that city a short time, he deposited $20,000 with a banker who was a Jew. He was then led by some new made acquaintances into scenes of dissipation and gaming, where he lost the remainder of his money. To add to his misfortunes, the Jew banker also failed, swindling him out of the money he had deposited with him.—His father, he said, had a brother in New York from whom he might have obtained assistance, but he determined, from motives of pride and chagrin, not to appeal to him in his extremity, by giving a statement of his condition. On receiving, with some doubts as to its truthfulness, the above statement, Mr. Browning took the young man into his employ for a few days, and set him to work "packing shingles." He afterwards went to Buffalo. Mrs. Browning, however, in the meantime, out of motives of curiosity, wrote a letter to the above-mentioned banker, whom the young man stated was doing business for his father, inquiring of him into the truth of the matter. The banker, on receipt of Mr. B.'s letter, immediately repaired to Tonawanda and confirmed the truth of the statement, and also related other facts in connection with the case more wonderful still. He stated that he had recently learned of the decease of the young man's father, who had died leaving this young man heir to $2,000,000, and also that $60,000 had already been remitted, and was in the hands of himself. The banker on receiving the news, and not finding the fortunate inheritor of this vast sum, advertised for him in the papers. The banker then gave Mr. Browning $25, to prosecute the search for him in Buffalo, where it was supposed he had repaired. After two days spent, the object of search was found in the Erie County workhouse, where he had been committed a few days previous as a vagrant. He was very sick and his disease was pronounced by the doctors to be incurable.—The Advertiser says that he still remains at the house of Mr. Browning, in Tonawanda, where he was removed when released from confinement. He has received large remittances from his banker, and it is not at all probable that he will ever enter a penitentiary again as a vagrant.

A Curious Story.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune tells the following story:—Some three years ago I was made acquainted with a most extraordinary narrative, of which I am now reminded by the sequel.—I will state the facts as nearly as I can, without pretending to the precision of my informant. Shortly after the revolutionary war, a certain man was keeping a tavern in Trenton. He had two daughters, his only children, and both of them said to be comely lasses. One day a French gentleman, with a rich equipage, rode up to the tavern and ordered dinner. One of the daughters attended to wait on him at the table, and he was either so fascinated by her actual charms (or so meditated by the good Regnier of "mine host," that when he had finished his dinner he offered the young lady his heart and his hand. She called her parents in to hear the singular offer, when he told them he was a widower, that he had property, and that he loved their daughter, whom, with their permission, he would wed in form as soon as they could reach Philadelphia. He moreover asked them to go with him to that city, and see the marriage properly performed. Within an hour the parents, with their daughter, were in the Frenchman's carriage on their way to Philadelphia, where the marriage took place. Not long afterwards the Monsieur set sail for France with his pretty young bride.

Many years passed away without any tidings from the young lady who had entered into marriage in such circumstances. Both her parents died without hearing what became of her, and her sister was married to a man named Cook. When the Rev. Mr. Armstrong was pastor of the Church in Trenton, several letters came to him from a London lawyer acting for this lady, and asking what become of her sister. Was she married? To whom? And had she children? In these letters the lawyer stated that the Frenchman treated his wife with the most considerate affection, but that his children, by a former marriage, resented her intrusion upon them, and made her unhappy. Her husband hearing how it was, agreed the evil by threatening to disinherit them. In due time he died, leaving her in her own right enough property to make her independent. She afterwards removed to England, and was there solicited in marriage by a wealthy gentleman, a widower, with grown children. She told him that her only objection to his offer was the fear that his children would make her unhappy. He called them together, and stated the matter to them, service in the event of a sudden armament. The commissioners are of opinion that these measures "are all that are needed to place the peace establishment of the navy on a firm and satisfactory basis." They admit that the Royal Navy is not popular with the mercantile marine, and suggest several improvements in the treatment of the seamen. Into these we cannot enter at length but they relate to victualling lodging, and clothing, the rank and promotion of the warrant officers. The commissioners anticipate the best results from the occasional promotion of a warrant officer to the quarter deck; at the same time, they are ready to admit that the promotion should only be granted for distinguished service, combined with exemplary conduct; and it should not be limited to the warrant officers, but should be open, in the case of very signal and extraordinary services, to any seaman in her Majesty's navy." From the gingerly manner in which ground is broken in the direction, we assume that the commissioners feel that they have to overcome long cherished prejudices. Now, we have always held that the true means for inducing spirited and intelligent young men to enter the army and navy, is to open the very highest promotion to courage and talent. The cold shade of aristocracy has been most injurous to the public service in this point. Although there is no purchase in the navy, a seaman has no chance of a commission, and an officer without interest is rarely advanced, however meritorious. The commissioners next proceed to the mode of manning the fleet on an emergency. They at once give up the old system of impressment as entirely impracticable, and they also reject the ballot for similar reasons. They place their reliance on a system of resort. An increase in the Marines is recommended to the number of five thousand men, and that the Coast-guard shall be augmented to twelve thousand. The Naval Coast Volunteers are regarded as not a reliable force and a strong preference is given to the seaman who has retired on a pension of six-pence a-day after serving for ten years. Taken together these bodies would supply about thirty thousand men, but that number is not considered sufficient. The commissioners look to the coasting trade, and employ sixty-three thousand men, including masters, and to the ships engaged in short foreign voyages, employing about forty thousand more. From these sources we have upwards of one hundred thousand seamen never absent for any length of time from the ports of the country. It is believed that twenty thousand can be brought to enrol themselves as "Royal Naval Volunteers." The inducements proposed to be held out are:—"1. Payments at short periods. 2. A pension at the age of 50 to 55. 3. Payment for time spent in practice. 4. Admission to the Coast-Guard. 5. Participation in the benefits of Greenwich Hospital. On their part they could engage to practice gunnery and to serve in case of emergency; and conditions would be framed to secure their coming forward to join the navy within a very short time after their services were required." Summing up, the commissioners are of opinion that they should secure a reserve of sixty thousand men available for service at a short notice. The annual cost of the standing reserves for the establishments is estimated at a little over one hundred thousand pounds, and that of the additional reserves, to be called out in case of war, at four hundred and ninety-four thousand pounds. The total increased expenditure proposed by the commissioners would amount to about half a million a-year.

The report will no doubt be made the subject of Parliamentary discussion, and we shall have ample opportunity for considering it in detail. At first sight it seems unobjectionable, and the addition to the estimates will not be refused if the men can be had for the money. The English people desire above all things to have an efficient navy. They have cheerfully given millions after millions to half a dozen Governments without attaining that end. There is no other country with such abundant means of construction. We can have any number of the best ships, if the Admiralty will only learn the best way of doing the work. In our merchant service we have all the elements of naval power. No other Government enjoys such advantages, and it is for us to find out how to make good use of them. The commissioners, recognising the changes in public sentiment, reject all notion of impressment and compulsory service. They say they have discovered how we may obtain a system of defence at once voluntary and effective. We repeat that expense cannot enter into our consideration in such a case. If we can "protect the country from the hazards of war," while we "improve the position of British seamen in the two services," by an outlay of half a million annually, the House of Commons will be ready with the vote.—London Times.

The Austrian Question.

The march of events towards a definite solution of the present European imbroglio has been equally steady and swift; and the world has had much fuller warning of the great war that would now appear to be very near at hand, than it had of the tremendous conflict which broke the will of Nicholas without humbling the power of Russia, and established the influence of France without meddling the dynasty of Napoleon.

The first symptoms of the policy now clearly proclaimed by the French Emperor were thrown out at the Congress of Paris in 1856. At that Congress France and Russia openly espoused, while England tacitly countenanced the propositions advanced by Sardinia, that Italy was the next great difficulty after Turkey in the way of a permanent European peace, and that the treaties of 1815, which had been so often torn to pieces in the East and in the West, must no longer be plastered in extenuation of a state of things incompatible with the quiet of the world and with the prosperity of the Italian people. Austria took serious umbrage at these propositions, and was still more seriously offended by the support which Sardinia had received in making them, from three, at least, of the six parties to the Congress. She forthwith set herself at work by hook, if possible, the Anglo-French alliance, and to revive in the East those party feelings of French influence which had contributed so much to bring on the great Russian war. Circumstances have favourably favored her; but she has failed on the principal point in both of these attempts.—Whatever ill-feeling may have been engendered between the British Prime and the Government of France, or whatever delay be thrown in the way of active operations in favour of Austria on the Mincio, there is now no conflict between Austria as the invader of Italian right and Italian independence. The people of England did not count a straw for the treaties of 1815. They rejoiced to see those treaties cast aside in Paris; in Rumania and Gibraltar; in Naples. They would equally rejoice to see the same treaties overthrown in Venice and in Milan. Few men know England better than the Emperor Napoleon III. Whatever offence has been given to her under his reign has arisen out of domestic complications in France over which it was, perhaps, impossible for any French Ruler to exercise complete control. In the foreign policy of the Empire, it would be difficult to point out a single step which has been taken without the sympathy of England, if we except the case of the Charles et Georges, in Portugal, in which it is beginning to be understood that France was both technically and substantially in the right, and that she could not have acted otherwise than she did without abandoning principles of national law for which no Power has contended more strenuously than England. It is then in the highest degree probable that France will move towards her ends in Italy, so cautiously and wisely as to compel the acquiescence of Englishmen in her policy, if she does not secure the co-operation of England in her armed assertion of the principles which she means to make triumphant. Austria, at least, would seem to be thoroughly awake to this probability; for that Empire is already giving signs of a disposition to escape from the Italian question through a new Paris Conference on the affairs of the Roman provinces. The high tone taken at first by the Austrian Government is perceptibly lowered in the latest tidings from Vienna; and the Austrian menace of a German Confederation against France seems to be dwindling down to a project of forming a compact with some of the lesser German States for an armed interference in the case of a conflict to the north of the Alps. Great anxiety, too, begins to be felt at Vienna in regard to the dispositions of Russia; and Prussia is drifting rapidly towards a strictly neutral attitude. In the posture of affairs indicated by these appearances, Austria would find herself no longer at liberty to treat even Sardinia on the same terms of disdainful refusal to enter into negotiations about Italy which she has hitherto assumed in her remonstrances against the urgency of the Emperor of the French.—She must, perforce, begin to see that the Italian question is the grave and pressing question it was stated by Count Cavour two years ago to be; and that she must either submit to discuss the means of settling it with her equals, and even with Sardinia, whom she regards as her inferior, or be prepared to meet the army of King Victor Emanuel, as the advance guards of the French demonstration, in the name of all Constitutional Europe. The character of the Austrian Emperor, who is both a young man and a military martinet, must tell for much upon the choice of Austria between those two alternatives; and its weight will in all probability be thrown into the scale of defiance and the sword. Add to this consideration the analogous fact that the Emperor of the French is also a soldier by training, and longs for an opportunity of proving that he was born a General as well as a Prince; and it will be seen that peace has already ceased to be a probability. In the first few days of excitement and dismay which followed the memorable scene of the New-Year's Day at the Tuileries, was certainly seemed the least probable result of the Italian complication. For in Austria as in France the immediate effect of that excitement and dismay was a general movement of the financial classes against the disturbance of European commerce. And this movement was echoed and supported from England. But the worst mischief which could be inflicted upon the finances of Western Europe by the actual breaking out of war has been already done, and the pervading anxiety of the public mind has gone far to control the enterprises of commerce within safer limits since. Meanwhile nothing has been done to change the essential elements of the situation; much to make Europe and the world fully conscious of these elements, and to spread the conviction that nothing like enduring tranquility can be looked for in Western Europe while the Austrian rule and influences in Italy remain what they are and for ten years past have been. In this aspect of matters there is everything to encourage Napoleon III. to perseverance in his course, everything to make a settlement of Italy by the sword greatly preferable to any imperfect or temporary adjustment of a few details in the position of Austria and her dependencies.

Manning the Navy.

In the present state of Europe there can be no subject more interesting to the people of England than the condition of the fleet. We have often contested and refuted the assertions so constantly paraded by continental writers that this is not a warlike nation. There is no lack of martial ardour amongst us, and a long series of victories have left a halo of glory around British arms. There is no chare and scarcely any sail which has not witnessed our prowess. We have never entered upon a war from which we have not emerged triumphant. If it were our use to boast, we could find ample material, but we are content to rest on the verdict of history.—England has never been appalled by reverses or cast down by difficulties. The energies, the resources, and the indomitable spirit of a free people have risen superior to every emergency. It may even be said that the presence of danger is required to call out the national force of character.—When the Russian war commenced we were encumbered by the rust of a long peace, and we were not prepared to take the field. In order to send a small army to the East we were compelled to strip our home garrison of every regiment. We were without a reserve, and recruits could only be obtained slowly and in small numbers. But when the press made known our disasters in the Crimea, and "more men from England" were called for to restore the preponderance of our arms, the youth and manhood flocked to the standard. The patriotism of the population was nobly vindicated, and when our allies and our enemy exhibited signs of exhaustion, we had fleets and armies with which we might have stood against all Europe. Attempts have been made to disparage the service of our soldiers in the Crimea, and to claim a larger share of glory for other warriors; but the heroes of the Alma and Inkerman, and the brave men who manned the trenches before Sebastopol, need no eulogy. We make no comparisons, we offer no contrasts, and we would not pluck one laurel from the allies who fought by our side. We have never failed to do them justice, or to acknowledge their courage and fidelity, but we must maintain that Englishmen were not found wanting in periods of danger and difficulty. The last accounts from India tells us of the termination of a great war and the suppression of a most formidable rebellion. In that life-and-death struggle we opposed hundreds to thousands, and on many fields the enemy outnumbered our small force in the proportion of twenty or thirty to one. But the British troops were disciplined by no raids, never retired, and never hesitated to attack. The capture of Delhi, Havelock's march, the relief of the Lucknow garrison, and the final reduction of the great stronghold will be eternally remembered amongst the noblest triumphs of military skill and daring. It was not only that the highest courage was displayed, but also heroic endurance and noble self-sacrifice—the determined plunk and lofty sense of duty of the Englishman—which must raise the English name all over the world. We refer thus briefly to these great events for the purpose of sustaining and illustrating our assertion that the English are a warlike nation. Indeed, when the blood of the people is stirred, the danger is that they are too ready for war. The war with Russia, the expedition to China, and the vast exertions made for extinguishing the Indian revolt, were all popular, although demanding large sacrifices from the people in men and money.—But although essentially warlike, we are not a military nation in the sense in which the term is understood on the continent of Europe. It is not our habit, nor is it our wish to maintain a large standing army. Peaceful and free, industrious and tranquil, conspicuous for our respect for the authority of the law, we have no need of a military force to preserve order at home. We have no desire of foreign conquest, or of imposing our will upon any State. Were it possible to induce the European monarchs to disarm, we should cordially concur in any measures that could be devised with that object. So long as the world remain as it is, we must maintain a force sufficient for the national defence, but, at the same time, we are careful to prevent the army from swelling to a magnitude that might be perilous to the national liberties. Considerations of policy, expediency, and necessity combine to keep our military establishments at the lowest point compatible with safety. While this state of things continues to exist, we shall not be a military nation; but on the sea we must always be powerful, or we shall be lost.—These islands are encircled and protected by the ocean, on which our fortresses float. The British empire encircles the globe, and its parts are held together by ships and commerce. We rely upon our navy to defend our distant possessions, and to guard our shores from invasion. Our natural line of defence is upon the sea; and, although we cannot exclude rivalry, it is our paramount duty to distance it out of all proportion. It is a condition of the very existence of England, as a first-rate Power, that she shall retain the undisputed command of the sea. Last week we reviewed the condition of our fleet, in connection with the proposal about to be brought forward by the Government. We were compelled to show that, although positively strong in ships and guns, this country does not maintain the position she ought to hold in comparison with other naval Powers. Of late years, successive French Governments have laboured with remarkable energy to create a great navy. France, it must be confessed, has beaten us in the race of ship-building, and, in case of emergency, would be able to put to sea with a steamer line of battle. The efforts of Russia are not to be despised or overlooked, since the great ambition of her Sovereigns is to raise her to the rank of a preponderating naval Power. Even Austria is encreasing the number of her ships of war, and Sardinia and Naples are struggling in the same direction. Combinations have been formed against us before now, and they may be again. Europe, at this moment, is agitated by fears of war, and it is impossible to predict how far we may be able to stand aloof, or how deeply we may become involved. We require a powerful and unassailable fleet for the defence of our shores, but we have it not. We are well aware of what this country can do with time for the development of her strength and resources, but it is of the first importance that we should be in readiness to repel an unexpected attack, or to grapple with a sudden exigency. For a long time the people have asked for, and they have been promised, a Channel fleet; but although we have the ships, we cannot man them. Seeing that we have more sailors than all the community has resumed its favourite system of money-making by means of raising the wind. To our contemporary's remarks on this subject we entirely subscribe. There cannot be a doubt that our commercial system, in some parts of the country more than others, has fallen into a pernicious and dishonest habit, taking it as a whole, and the community is more and more getting into a way of trying to live without labour, and to get rich by unlawful means. The non-producing classes, as we have so often pointed out, are terribly out of portion to the producers; and the disproportion is going on increasing at such a rate, that society would seem resolved on solving the problem of standing on its own head, the pyramid poised on its apex in place of resting on a solid base. No wonder it falls occasionally and no wonder that in some parts of the country, where the reversal of the natural position is carried to an extreme, the fall should be so frequent and so disastrous.—The only true source of wealth is labor applied to the development of the resources of nature. The credit system is good in so far as it is auxiliary in a legitimate way to this application and development. But when it becomes a means by which a large section of the community shirk the duty of contributing to the common stock of wealth when it seduces people to speculate in place of working, or to occupy themselves in callings that are not properly speaking productive, it interrupts very seriously the true progress of the community, and it becomes moreover an organised swindle to enable those who do not produce to put their hands in the pockets of those who do.

We cannot, therefore, regard any circumstance tending to give a moderate check to the credit system as a very great evil. No doubt the inconvenience would be felt at first. It is not pleasant to society to be driven unwillingly to any re-adjustment of its relations and pursuits. But in the long run it is well that they should be re-adjusted, and sooner or later they must be. No system of practical falsehood can go on forever. The truth is always sure to assert itself, and it always does, by terrible catastrophes to the long run if timely warnings are not heeded. The restriction of capital in the shape of loans, temporary investments, and imports from abroad, which would be the result of a European war, would be one of the mildest correctives that could be desired. Anything tending to curtail loans and imports, that is to say credit and speculative expenditure, which at the same time should give a stimulus to productive industry would, we should say, be almost an unmixed good, so far as this country is concerned. It would check our development in a direction that is essentially false and fraught with ever-accumulating danger, and force us, by influences that are far from being disagreeable although we may regret their unhealthy origin, to resort to the only safe and honest means by which a community should try to subsist, the only possible means by which it can be permanently prosperous and great even in material sense.—Scottish American Journal.

PRESERVE BUTTER.—A GOOD EXPEDIENT TO USE.—Aberdeenshire is famous for good butter, and the parish of Udell stands preeminent. In regard to their produce, we find the following in an exchange paper, and commend it to our dairy readers, to make an experiment, and report the result:

Take two quarts of the best common salt one ounce of sugar, and one ounce of saltpetre; take one ounce of this composition for one pound of butter; work it well into the mass, and close it up for use. The butter cured with this mixture appears of a rich and marrowy consistence, and fine colour, and never acquires a brittle hardness, nor tastes salty. Dr. Anderson says: "I have eat butter cured with the above composition that had been kept three years and it was as sweet as at first." But it must be noted that the butter thus cured requires to stand three week or a month before it is used. If it is sooner opened, the salts are not sufficiently blended with it, and sometimes the coolness of the nitre will be perceived, which totally disappears afterwards.

Trial by Jury in Civil Cases.

This subject is exciting considerable interest both in Canada and the mother Country, and many distinguished men have since the first appointment of The Common Law Commissioners, by the Imperial Parliament in 1831, taken different sides in discussing it.

It is said, that Lord Campbell, the eminent lawyer who now holds the proud position of Chief Justice of the first Common Law Court in England, intends introducing a measure in the Imperial Parliament, to do away with the necessity of unanimity, and allowing that the finding of the majority shall determine the verdict of the Jury.

In our own Country, we see insidious advances made to change the method of trying cases in our Law Courts, and should Lord Campbell's measure pass the English Legislature, no doubt the zeal of our Law reformers will prompt the passage of a similar Law here without any delay.

The Hon. member for South Ontario, a gentleman noted for his eminence in our highest Equity Courts, is almost the only lawyer who appears to consider juries unnecessary, and as that is a point on which from the nature of his practice, he can have little personal knowledge, we might well weigh the authoritative voice of all the members of the Common Law Bar, in the Lower House, some among them being men of great experience and ability.

Now as to Lord Campbell's so called amendment of the Law, we think on the contrary, that that rule which exacts unanimity, has a great deal to recommend it, and many of the arguments in its favour are admitted by its enemies. To say the least of it, a rule which has existed from the year 1368 down to the present time, and as to which the Common Law Commissioners of 1853, are compelled reluctantly to admit that "on the whole it works well and enjoys the confidence of the public," ought not be too lightly meddled with, and we cannot help thinking that with all its faults, the Common Law mode of trial of matters of fact, is for all matters of importance, weight or difficulty, immeasurably superior to any other, and that evil will be the hour for the people of this Country, when seduced by any theory however plausible they consent to part with it.

Having said this much in favour of unanimity, we will now proceed to give some of our reasons, and we would ask first: does not the requiring concurrence by all the Jurors in the verdict tend to ensure truth in the decision? surely, ceteris paribus, two men are more likely to be right than one; and twelve, than eight, nine, ten or eleven. Poisson and La Croix, two French legal authors of eminence, have attempted to apply the mathematical calculus of probabilities to a Court of justice. The probability of the correctness in a verdict pronounced by several men, is of course the compound ratio of the probability of its correctness if pronounced by each separately. Tried in this way, the probability of error where a majority of nine is sufficient for decision, is as 1 to about 22; while if unanimity be exacted, it falls as low as 1 to upwards of 1000. Of course it is understood that this calculous affords no practical clue as to the correctness of a given decision.

Again we think another necessary consequence is, that each member of the jury being aware that his individual concurrence will be exacted, will be more duly impressed with a sense of his own personal responsibility in the verdict which shall be rendered, and more disposed to give it his attention and the utmost powers of his mind.

Further, it ensures a full, free, and effective discussion of the case, for the opinions of all the members must be collected, and the humblest man among them has the means of compelling his fellows to listen to his voice, receive his opinion with courtesy, and discuss it with respect. Supposing the opposite system to prevail:—so soon as it is discovered that a majority were of one way of thinking, further discussion of the subject will be commonly rejected as useless, and the opinions of the minority summarily and rudely silenced. How would we reflect on the confidence engendered in the public mind in the decisions of a tribunal, which speaks with so undecided a tone. To say that it is in criminal cases only that the constitutional protection now afforded by our jury system is necessary, is surely incorrect, for very not a man's political and social, if not his physical existence itself, be destroyed by the consequences of an injudicious administration of the civil as of the criminal law.

One of the objections raised against the present system is that it is absurd to expect twelve men voluntarily to agree on any subject. Now let us observe in this that the functions of a jury do not call on them to determine which party is, philosophically speaking, in the right. The question for them to consider is, has the party on whom the burden of proving lay, made out his case—so that a jury who find for a defendant do not thereby assert that the plaintiff has no cause of complaint against him, but that he has failed in making it out. We have heard it remarked that the apparent unanimity is produced often by the fears of the Jury, lest the Court should exercise its powers of locking them in, without food or fire. Now setting apart the fact that this hypothesis supposes that our Juries are so pressed by this sort of argumentum ad centrem, that in order to avoid a few hours delay and disagreeableness, they will find verdicts regardless of their oaths, of their duties as citizens, and of the rights of the parties litigant, we think it will be found that the experience of every known legal tribunal shows, that agreement after conference among its members will be found the rule, and disagreement the exception.

Supposing a case, in which there are eleven jurors who are right, and one dissentient who prevents a verdict being rendered.—What is the worst—a few hours, and perhaps a night's discomfort by the other jurors, and a discharge of the jury from the deciding of the case, which, if the Plaintiff desires, can be tried by another jury. Now, the fundamental principle of all jurisprudence is, that laws must be framed to meet what usually takes place.

The legislating for an extreme case like the above demonstrates unacquaintance with the very A. B. C. of jurisprudence and legislation. Disregard of possible mischiefs, consequent on wholesome freedom, is a characteristic of the British Constitution—thus the Queen could by her single act legally set the Nation at war with the whole World; the House of Lords from the most factious motives reject every Bill brought before them; or the Commons House in similar manner refuse the Supplies, and stop the whole machinery of Government. All this might be done—legally done—but is its possibility any ground for limiting the action of the great bodies of the State? Our jurisprudence adopts a similar principle. In an early case, tempore Henry 4th, counsel for defendant seeing that the Court were about to decide against his client, said—"The defendant is undone and impoverished forever if this action be maintained against him,"—on which Chief Justice Herring said—"What is that to us? It is better that he be quite undone than that the law should be changed for him!"

Now, taking the case in other countries. In Scotland trial by jury in civil cases is not of indigenous growth, but has been introduced only since the 55, George 3rd, and by a recent act, 17 and 18 Victoria, if a Scottish jury are unable to agree after being kept in deliberation for six hours, the verdict of nine out of the twelve is taken as the verdict of the whole. With all this the ancient system of taking a precognition before the Sheriff, and a judgment of the Court upon the facts thus found seems still to be the favourite method with the people, so that we have little light as yet from Scotland on the subject.

In France where juries are allowed in criminal cases only, and unanimity is not required, no less than five changes have been made in the law since its introduction, about sixty years ago. In 1830, at least the bare majority was sufficient to return a verdict, and it may safely be asserted that the findings of French juries showed more inconsistency than is usual, with British juries; for instance, the frequent finding the accused guilty of "murder, under extenuating circumstances," when the evidence clearly indicated simple condemnation or acquittal, shows that want of unanimity does not always afford consistency in the verdicts.

In Brunswick, juries are required to be unanimous, but after twenty-four hours disagreement are entitled to their discharge. Now as to this, by our law the Judge has it in his discretion to determine the period, and practically this rule is almost the same as in Brunswick; but is it not safer to reserve this discretion than if a fixed time were defined by law? for then a dishonest juror, could effectually, and without danger to himself, prevent a verdict, by carrying on a harrassing discussion with his fellows until the allotted time expires; whereas now he has no certain prospect before him when his confinement shall cease.

In conclusion let us trust that our Legislature in taking up the subject, when it comes before them, will not forget the words of the illustrious statesman, lawyer, and philosopher, who says in words worthy of remembrance—"Antiquity deserveth that reverence, that men should make a stand thereupon and discover what is the best way—but when the discovery is well taken, then to make progression."

Arrival of the "Wesser."

NEW YORK, March 18.—The steamer Weser, which left Cork, March 6, arrived to-day, and brings Liverpool advices to the evening of the 4th.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Parliamentary proceedings were interesting. An important movement had taken place among the leaders of the liberal party. Lord Lennox, one of the lords of the treasury, had resigned, and was succeeded by Peter Blackburn.

The Morning Advertiser had reported the statement that the Marquis of Clanricarde, Lord Mayoro, and Sir Edward Lytton only held office temporarily. The war question remains undisturbed in aspect.

FRANCE.

There are rumours in Paris that Austria had made counter proposals to Lord Cowley, in which she is supported by Prussia.

The French papers are getting more belligerent, but warlike preparations at Marseilles are somewhat relaxed. The Bourse continued sensitive and fluctuated. The Constitutionnel's had announced positively the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome, but the Moniteur announced the statement premature.

A Marseilles despatch says that Russia has 60,000 troops on the Pruth, and has augmented her army in Georgia.

PARIS Saturday Evening.—A pacific article in the Moniteur was causing a great excitement on the Bourse, and an advance of one-half in rents, closing firm.

AUSTRIA.

It is announced that the Emperor had become more determined in warlike preparations, and embittered against France.—The Vienna journals are also warlike.—Military preparations are continued in Italy Lord Cowley would leave Vienna on the 5th.

The Paris correspondents of the London journals wrote as if war was almost certain. It is also stated that a violent controversy had occurred between Prince Napoleon and Count Persigny. The former assumed very warlike tones expressing contempt for the treaties of 1815; while Persigny strongly protested against such principles, and denounced them as mischievious and dangerous. Preparations are being made for the arrival in France of some distinguished personage, and it was hinted that it might be the Pope.

The Paris correspondence of the London Times says that at a recent interview between the Papal Nuncio, and M. Walewski, the latter who is opposed to war, commented so pointedly on the obstinacy of the Pontificial Government in refusing concession so much required by its subjects, that the Nuncio asked whether it was meant to compel him to demand his passport. Walewski replied no; but that this was not the moment to disguise the truth.

The Havre Journal announced that Prince Napoleon had contracted with a shipping house at Bordeaux for the conveyance of 10,000 Chinese emigrants to Martinique.

The latest correspondence of the London journals indicates very little confidence in the success of Lord Cowley's mission.

The Austrian troops at Piacenza are increasing daily: 12,000 have been placed on a war-footing since the 1st of March.

The Cabinet of Vienna agreed to maintain 150,000 men in Lombardy, and erect fortifications in all directions. It is reported that Arch Duke Albrechdt and Baron Hess have been made Marshals. The lower classes of Vienna are becoming exceedingly warlike. The Government is said to have contracted with the Lombardy Venetian Railway for the transportation of 75,000 men during March. The official Vienna Gazette says, as soon as notification in writing of Cardinal Antonelli was avowed there, it is understood that the evacuation of the States of the Church by the Austrian troops will follow.

It is said that Austria will grant foreign vessels the privilege of navigating the Danube. The Austrian army in Italy has been placed on a war-footing.

London, Saturday evening.—Viscount Hardinge, Under-Secretary of War, has resigned.

THE GRAND DUKE PETER'S AMUSEMENTS.—This is what we were made to suffer morning, noon, and until late at night. The Grand Duke, with rare perseverance, had trained a pack of dogs; by dint of blows, and ballooing after the manner of a muleteer or huntsman, he made them go from one end of his two rooms (for he had no more) to the other. These dogs which showed signs of fatigue, or broke from their leashes, were severely chastised, which, of course, made them howl still more appallingly. When weary at last of this exercise, detestable to the ears, and destructive to the repose of his neighbours, he would take his violin, which, as we know, he scraped infamously, and with extraordinary violence, while walking about the room.—After which he would recommence the education and chastisement of the pack, which appeared to me really cruel. One day, hearing a poor dog cry terribly for a long time, I opened the door of my bed-chamber where I was sitting, and which adjoined the one where the scene was taking place, and I saw the Grand Duke holding up one of his dogs by the collar, while a boy, a Kalmuk by birth, whom he had, held the same dog by the tail (it was a poor little King Charles, of English breed), and the Grand Duke with all his strength, was beating this dog with the thick handle of a whip! I began to intercede for the poor animal, but this only caused the blows to be redoubled. Unable to support this sight, which seemed so cruel, I retired to my chamber with tears in my eyes. Generally speaking, tears and cries, instead of creating any compassion in the Grand Duke, only made him more angry. Pity was a feeling too troublesome for his sympathies, and insupportable to his soul. One day, when I entered the chamber of the Grand Duke, my eye was attracted by the sight of a huge rat which he had hung, with all the accompaniments of a criminal execution, in the middle of a cabinet which he had constructed of boards.—I asked him the meaning of it. He said the rat had committed a crime demanding an extreme penalty, according to military law; that he had climbed over the ramparts of a card fortress, which stood on a table in the cabinet, and had eaten two sentinels, made of paste, who were keeping guard at the bastions; that he had judged the offender by the laws of war; that the dog had caught him; that he had been hung without delay; and that he would remain suspended for three days, as an example.—Memoirs of the Empress Catherine the Second.

PHYSICAL CHANGES AND PERSONAL IDENTITY.—The 116 lbs. weight of water which forms three-fourths of the matter composing our bodies is rejected with great rapidity in respiration and natural discharge. The carbon is expired with each action of the lungs in large quantities, combined with oxygen, another constituent of our bodies, in the form of carbonic acid. The lime escaping in other ways, is rejected from our bones and replaced by a fresh supply.—There is not a movement; not an action of a muscle, a muscle, or a nerve; not a pulsation of the heart or artery; not a peristaltic motion of the intestines, which is not the proximate cause of the rejection of the used up matter and the demand for a fresh supply from the digestive apparatus, just as in a machine the wear and tear of the parts is proportioned to the force and continuance of their motions. Although the rapidity with which the materials of the body are thus changed varies, in consequence of individual circumstances, according to their varying habitudes and occupations, it appears that a total change of the material constituents of the body takes place within an interval much shorter than was supposed by the early physiologists. According to some authorities, the average length of this interval does not exceed thirty days. It is however, generally agreed that it is a very brief period. This, then, being the case, let us ask, what is it that was identical in the Duke of Wellington dying at Walmer, in September, 1852, with the Duke of Wellington commanding at Waterloo in June, 1815? Assuredly it was not the material. There should have been a change of form, or matter common to his body on the occasion. The interval consisting of a period of thirty-seven years and two months, the entire mass of matter, composing his body, must have undergone a complete change several hundred times; yet no one doubts that there was something there which did not undergo a change, except in its relation to the mutable body, and which possessed the same thought, memory, and consciousness, and constituted the personal identity of the individual; and hence it is as demonstrable as any proposition in geometry that something which thus abode in the body, retaining the consciousness of the past, could not have been an atom, or any number of atoms, of matter, that is to say, something spiritual.—Dr. Lardner.

Provincial Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

ELECTIVE SPEAKERS.

Monday, March, 21, 1859.

Hon. Mr. MORRIS moved "That an humble address be presented to Her most Gracious Majesty the Queen, praying that a Bill may be laid before the Imperial Parliament during its present Session, for enabling the Provincial Parliament so to legislate, if it see fit, as to procure for this House the power of electing, from time to time, one of its own Members to be its Speaker, in pursuance of the address of this House to Her Majesty, bearing date the fifteenth day of April last, and that in such Bill a clause may be inserted enabling the said Provincial Parliament, if it see fit, to change the name of this House, and also the title of Legislative Councillor." The hon. gentleman from the county of Essex last session, had conducted through this House an address praying that this Council might have power to elect one of themselves, to be their Speaker. That address passed through this body by an unanimous vote, but unfortunately, by some circumstance unknown to this House, and unknown to the then President of the Council, it lay in his office for some five months after it had passed. He [Mr. Morris] did not desire to lead any hon. member to suppose that its retention was known to the hon. member opposite:—Quite the contrary, for he believed he would scorn to be a party to the retention of that document. But, unfortunately as he [Mr. Morris] had said, it lay in the drawer of the President of the Council for five months, and when it came to light the Imperial Parliament had been prorogued, so that on its arrival at the Colonial Office nothing remained to be done but to acknowledge its receipt, which was done by the Colonial Secretary, at the command of her Majesty. He, therefore, thought it right the request of the House should be renewed. It was right this House should echo the address of last year, and particularly so, as he [Mr. Morris] went further in this address, than the hon. gentleman from Essex did in the address of last year. It was asked now, not only that the House might have the power to elect one of its own members to be Speaker, but also that they might have power to change the name of this branch of the Legislature. He [Mr Morris] found there was some misapprehension with regard to the election of Speaker, to the Upper branch of the Legislature. An hon. gentleman, a member of this House, had told him [Mr. Morris] that it was unreasonable; that in no Colony had the Legislative Council the power of electing its own Speaker. So far from that being the case in the first constitution given by the Home Government to Australia, two-thirds of the members were elected by the people, the remaining part being chosen by the Crown, but when the House was convened, it had power to elect its own Speaker. All he [Mr. Morris] desired was, that the Legislature of this great colony should have power to elect from its members, a Speaker to preside over its deliberations. Next, with regard to the the change of name; last year they went farther than he [Mr. Morris] now went. The House Government had time and again declared that they had no desire to interfere with any purely domestic, or local question, but were on the contrary desirous that the Canadians themselves should settle their own matters. He (Mr. Morris) was well aware that there was a difference of opinion among members. Some thought the change desirable; others again were strongly opposed to it. He (Mr. Morris) was one who did not think the name was sufficiently distinctive, and therefore it was not the most appropriate one that could be chosen. The question simply was, "shall we ask for power to change our name." It did not involve a change, unless the majority should think it desirable. On that subject he hoped there would be but one opinion.

Hon. Mr. VANKOUGHNET suggested that the motion should be withdrawn. With respect to its first part, on address had already been sent to Her Majesty, and he did not see the necessity for another. The best way would be for the House to ask the Governor General to communicate with the Home authorities on the subject. He thought the latter portion of the motion impolitic. The mover did not propose a name; he did not even ask the House to pledge itself to change the name after they had got the power. It was unnecessary to trouble Her Majesty with such a useless matter.

Hon. Mr. PATTON denied that the address of last session was carried unanimously. True, the House was not divided upon the question; but he was opposed to it, as well as many other members, and he protested against it being thought that the whole Council would have voted for it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON agreed with the last speaker. He did not think it dignified to be always meddling with our constitution. It had been given us but a few years, but we had altered it several times during that period.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON opposed the motion.

Hon. Mr. CRAWFORD was in favour of an elective Speaker, but not of calling this House by the name of "Senate." Such a name was suggestive of past over-pleasant scenes.

Hon. Mr. DESSAULLES seconded the motion, arguing that as, the House had passed the address of last year, it was bound also to pass this. As to the second part of the motion, they simply asked leave to change their name. It did not follow from that, that they would either alter their name, or choose name offensive to the Home authorities.

Hon. Messrs. MOOSH and DE BLAQUIERE also spoke against the motion, when

Hon. Mr. MORRIS altered it in the way suggested by Mr. Vankoughnet, requesting the Governor General to communicate with the Home authorities with respect to the address of this session, and setting out that portion of the resolution referring to the change of name.

It was then carried, and a committee appointed to draft an address thereupon.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.—In the life of Dr. Zachary Pearce, Bishop of Rochester, prefixed to his Commentary on the four Evangelists, two vols. 4to, 1777, occurs the following interesting picture of Sir Isaac Newton in his extreme old age, which seems to have escaped the notice of the biographers of the great philosopher.—The Bishop says:—"A few days before the house died I made him a visit at Kensington, where he was then for his health, and where I found Mr. Image, the watchmaker, with him; he withdrew as soon as I came in, and went away. I dined with Sir Isaac on that day, and we were alone all the time of my stay with him. I found him writing over his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms, without the aid of spectacles, at the greatest distance in the room from the window, with a parcel of books on the table before him; a shade upon his paper. Seeing this, on my entering the room I said to him: 'Sir, you seem to be writing in a place where you cannot see well.' His answer was, 'A little light serves me.'—He then told me 'that he was preparing his chronology for the press, and that he had written the greatest part of it over again for that purpose.' He read, to me two or three sheets of what he had written (about the middle, I think, of the work) on occasion of some points of Chronology which had been mentioned in our conversation. I believe that he continued reading to me, and talking about what he had read, for near an hour before the dinner was brought up. And one particular I well remember, viz.: that, speaking of some fact, he could not recollect the name of the King in whose reign it had happened, and therefore he complained of his memory beginning to fail him; but he added immediately that it was in such an year of such an Olympiad—naming them both very exactly—a circumstance which I thought very observable, as the ready mention of such chronological dates seemed to me a greater proof of his memory's not failing him than the name of the King would have been.—Notes and Queries.

Mrs. Dunbar,

F. G. CALLENDER,

Surgical and Mechanical Dentist,

KNOWS to the inhabitants of Peterborough and vicinity, for the past 13 years, has made that he will continue to visit Peterboro', on the first Monday in each month, for the week, prepared to perform all operations of the profession, in defiance of competition as to mechanical dexterity, (except filling teeth with platina, it being a substance not then used by the profession.) He is also prepared to insert Truth on Vulcanized Rubber, a mouth approved over triple, being free from taste, much cheaper than Gold, and is said to be equal in neatness and durability, and much more agreeable in the mouth, being less weighty.

Public attention is invited to the above. Rooms over Mr. Clarkson's Store.

The New Reform Bill.

From the Times.

The first observation that occurs to us, that Ministers seem not before they applied themselves to legislation to have represented to themselves distinctly and clearly the precise mischief it was their wish to remedy. This was a point on which, in the debates on the first Reform Bill, there was no difficulty whatever. The ends for which government was carried on, and the means by which it was carried on, were alike distasteful to the public out of doors and to the majority of the House of Commons.—Speaker after speaker could point with indignation to enormous lists of pensions and sinecures—words, of which the first has lost in our days its invidious signification, while the second is almost unknown. They could allude with only too much truth to a widely diffused spirit of dissatisfaction, to frequent outrages in the rural districts, and dangerous combinations in the manufacturing towns, and they could say with truth, as well as with plausibility, that the source of all these evils were to be found in a Parliament the seats of which were notoriously bought and sold, or held as a property by Peers for whom the Constitution had already provided a suitable sphere of political activity. But we know not, after having carefully read the Reform Bill by the aid of such light as the elaborate comment of Mr. Disraeli throws upon it, what in the mind of its framer was the disorder for which the remedy is adapted. It is quite clear that the existence of small boroughs is no offence in the eyes of Lord Derby and his colleagues, for they have only undertaken disfranchisement with the view of supplying as many seats as they might think the complete representation of all the interests of the country requires. Nor are they repelled by rotten boroughs, to which the principle they have adopted has been exceedingly merciful, for Mr. Disraeli actually exults in the preservation of Arundel, and points out the advantage which results from the peculiar religious faith of the noble family to which it belongs. Indeed, so thoroughly is this principle of unlimited tolerance for the so-called anomalies of our Constitution avowed, that it is difficult to see how, on their own principles, Ministers have been able to prevail upon themselves to recommend any disfranchisement at all.

If we pass to the extension of the country franchise we are equally at a loss to know what is the precise grievance which the framers of the bill intended to remedy. To many minds there is a very serious grievance connected with the representation of counties—the great power exercised over them by an aristocracy of landed proprietors which renders their representation far more close and inaccessible to popular influences than that of the boroughs. But, in the first place, it is not likely that this grievance would be recognised as such by the Ministry many of whose members and most of whose followers are returned by the interests in question. Such a spirit of self-immolation argues a degree of superhuman virtue of which men, and especially men in office, are seldom indeed found to be capable. Nor, indeed, does it appear that they have any wish to diminish the influence of great proprietors; for whatever injury that influence may be supposed to have received by lowering the country franchise they seek to compensate by confining to the boroughs the small freeholders who have hitherto voted for counties, and by giving to persons resident in counties the right of voting in boroughs in respect of freeholds situated there.

If, then, we cannot find that the framers of the bill had before them any serious mischief which they proposed to remedy, to what cause are we to attribute its existence? Undoubtedly to the fact that each of three preceding Governments—had promised Reform, and it was deemed impossible to face the majority of the House of Commons without a similar undertaking. The pledge had to be redeemed, and redeemed by a measure which might have some chance of satisfying the wishes of moderate men and a fair probability of passing into a law. The lowering of the country franchise is proposed, not, we believe, from any practical feeling of the evils of the existing system, but because it had already been affirmed by the House of Commons on Mr. Locke King's motion, and because it was believed that it could safely be resisted. The disfranchisement was given to satisfy a few Reformers, who were pledged to something of the kind, and was restricted within such narrow limits because it was safe to do so and because those who proposed it had no real wish for disfranchisement at all. The identification of the borough and county franchise was invented to conceal the wish of relieving the counties from borough influence, and to afford a plausible ground for refusing to lower the voting qualifications in the boroughs. The only parts of the bill to which we can accord the merit of honesty framed to meet a mischief really felt by its authors is that which extends without lowering the franchise, which provides for voting without requiring the presence of the elector, supplies fresh polling places at the expense of the country, and provides a registry which can be worked without the claim of an elector. The intention of these clauses cannot be too highly praised; they are conservative, in the truest sense of the word, by giving votes and the opportunity of using them to persons disfranchised either by the operation of law or by their own habits of recklessness, intemperance, or idolatry, and bringing to bear on public affairs a class of quiet intelligence and good sense which has hitherto been local and voiceless. The best that can be said of the measure is that it is practicable, which both of the predecessors since the first Reform Bill could have been; and, if not the offspring of very deep convictions in the Government, it is perhaps on that very account only the better adapted to the [illegible] which has been raised [illegible] and formed—to the public sensation principally by the efforts of Lord John Russell and the Society of [illegible] to which Ministers have done homage by [illegible] and which they are endeavouring to satisfy, while they are [illegible] the popular passion of the moment, whatever may be gained in theory, of making any considerable practical amendment in the representation of the people.

The Crisis.

The Governments of Europe still continue to talk of peace and to prepare for war. While we at home are discussing the Reform question, and referring the shipping interest and its difficulties to a committee, troops assemble at Lyons; men are called back from furlough to Vienna; cannons of rare device emerge from French foundories and are whipped south almost as soon as they cool; the German Confederation rouses itself into patriotism; and Italy holds its breath with expectation. We sincerely trust that Lord Cowley may hush all this gathering storm into peace—like Neptune putting his head out of the sea in Virgil—but we scarcely expect it. For, not only does it seem that people living near the scene of action do not expect it; but who can help thinking that Napoleon must have had deeper designs this long time, than any little concessions are likely to stop? We say little concessions, because there is not the least reason to suppose that in great matters—matters of national honour—Austria will yield at all; and among ourselves in England, we all feel somehow that we should despise her if she did.

The question now being decided—or perhaps actually decided—at Vienna, is, how much the Emperor of Austria will tolerate from France. He will evacuate the Legations—coincidently with France—at the Pope's request. Well and good. How long the Pope can hold his ground after the withdrawal of foreign troops, is his own affair. Austria is only to take any step compatible with treaties that may avert the chance of war. Then there is the Principalities question; and in this case, probably Austria will agree to recognise Couza, on the understanding that he confines himself, of course, within the limits imposed by the Paris Congress. But this is not all that is expected from the Emperor. He is further it seems, invited to break through his engagements with those minor Italian Powers, of which he is the patron. What is the pretext, here? "Reform." But reform in corrupt countries, means revolution and of revolution, France, says the Imperial pamphlet is a foe. So, that what we ultimately arrive at, is that Austria is to leave the field open to the revolution, in order that the consequent disturbances may give France a pretext of intervention.—This is the game up to the present stage of it. Napoleon has an army; he has a motive; and he is waiting for a pretext. If he can get Austria to furnish him one, plausible enough to fill a manifesto, then, hey for the eagles and glory, and all the rest that makes the lurid poetry of Bonapartism.

Lord Cowley, is counselling moderation—withdrawal from the Legations, the recognition of Couza, and reform in Italy.—But that he counsels—or that Austria will yield—all the concessions demanded by Napoleon, we do not believe. It is out of the question that the Emperor of Austria should be forbidden to make such treaties with Italian potentates, as may be dictated by their mutual convenience as neighbouring Powers. Of course, anybody has a right to find fault with these potentates—to say that they are feeble despots, whose regime is an unpleasant spectacle to free men. Many people in England who dislike the regulations which control the French press, or the government of the Papal States by a parcel of priests, or the roasting of negroes in the southern parts of America. But, surely in all such cases, the first duty in the matter devolves upon those immediately concerned; and France without assuming a kind of political Popedom, with Paris for its seat, has no call whatever to meddle with misdoings in the South! This is our view, for the most part, in England at all events; and what is more, it is a view making itself felt more and more every day in Germany also. The world has had enough of French propagandism, which has always begun with sentimentality and vapouring, and ended in oppression and bloodshed. The opportunity is now excellent for the Powers, immediately exposed to her affronts, to unite themselves at once, and determinedly to suppress the nuisance.

The spirit of Germany itself seems excellent. What we hope is, that the rulers of the great Germanic peoples will know how to avail themselves of it; and they may be sure that they never had a better opportunity of uniting themselves, by a national policy, without their countrymen.—For our parts, in England, the French Alliance exists only as a means for preserving the best interests of Europe, and is broken at once when these are invaded.—Alliances with us are only fixed for purposes of good. Cromwell favoured the French alliance, not from any abstract preference of France, but because—while Mazarin trusted England with respect, Spain was the Power then most hostile to the world's good government: and Holland the one most grasping in matters of trade. These are questions of general convenience; and an alliance formed in one conjuncture of affairs, becomes properly, and indeed of honourable necessity, dissolved in another. Then, a Power which fails to use that war—for war and ambition's sake—lost in the existing stage of the world's history deserves a crime commits an offence against the generation. The connections of particular alliances are broken by acts which strike at the peace of the world at large, and the universal honour and interest require a general protest against the first offender. Let Austria act with moderation while the acts with France, and she is sure to be safe in the long run.—London Times.

India.

The intelligence from India is looking better, and will soon cease to call for special notice. We may, however, mention that our troops on the Goomtee were commanded by Lord Clyde, that the enemy dispersed and that rebellion no longer exists in Oude. The masters of the Commercial Bank have been arrested and confined, and that may now ventured to embark when its trade the field. We had heard of large masses of troops under the command of the Begum and the powerful chiefs who remained faithful to her cause, of jungle fortresses bristling with artillery, and of a hostile population in the northern divisions of Oude. We have been told also of jungle fortresses nearly inaccessible, and defended by heavy guns.—Above all it was said that the rebels were desperate, hopeless of pardon, and determined to fight to the last gasp. But as Lord Clyde advanced, the enemy dispersed like a mist on the rising of the sun. The jungle forts were abandoned without a blow being struck, and the chiefs surrendered or fled. The Begum's army stood only until our troops arrived within range, when they abandoned the field in cowardly panic.—There was but little heroism in the last days of the Oude monarchy. The scattered remnants of the rebel forces with the Begum and the miscreant Nana Rao escaped over the Nepaulese frontier. Those who were of opinion that Sir Jung Bahadoor would play us falsely, must now be convinced that their suspicions were groundless. He has applied for British troops to help him in capturing the rebels who sought refuge in his hills, and has declared his intention of surrendering all rebels whom his soldiers may capture. Brigadier Horsford has, therefore, crossed the Raptee and pushed up the passes. Thus there is some chance of catching Nana Rao, unless he flies as the congenial monsters who roam through the Terrai, or threads his way through the mountains into Thibet. We hope, however, that justice will overtake the dastardly murderer of English women and children. We shall not feel that we have triumphed until the massacre of Cawnpore has been avenged.

The ever-flying Tantia Topee has been overhauled once more, this time at Sekkur, by Brigadier Holmes. His first thought seems to have been to seek refuge in the deserts of Bikaneer, or the jungles of Joudhpore. But revising his determination, probably led to do so by the reflection that the Bikaneer Rajah is true to us, he betook himself towards the Shekawuttee country. The farther he goes northward the more his dangers increase. The south is closed to him. He approaches the Punjaub, and he will have to exercise even additional vigilance, and to display, even in a more astonishing degree, his notorious fleetness of flight, if he hopes to escape the long-armed and swift-footed functionaries who dwell in these parts. Clearly the game is up for him.

Measures seem at length to have been taken to settle our long-standing accounts with the Rohillas. Sir Hugh Rose is on their track, and they will find it impossible to circumvent him. They should be dealt with once for all. They are the Pindares of the Deccan.

DUNDAS, March 24, 1859.

The jury met again at 10 o'clock this morning. The only witness called was

Francis Hawkins, who said—I was at the scene of the late accident at about 8 o'clock on the morning of Saturday; I noticed the break, and a stream of water running from the table-land on the top of the mountain, and running down to a basin immediately at the back of the break, and as I suppose, ran through a blind drain; the stream was not very large then—about the size of a person's arm; I suppose it was just the drainage of the surface land about; there was every evidence of its having been large during the rain.

To a Juror—I saw two dead bodies; I have noticed particularly that the watermark was about three feet higher in the basin where the breach took place; there is a piece of high ground between this basin and the culvert. In ordinary showers, I think all the water soaked through the piece immediately at the back of the break.

To Mr. Thomas—From the nature of the ground the grade was sufficient to carry away the water to the culvert; there was a rise of two feet east of the break; the water would have to be two feet high before it would flow eastward. If the Company had made the grade properly the water might have been carried away; the water soaking through that bank would have the effect of making it like soft mortar; I have no doubt that the train which passed over before had a good deal to do with shaking it; the posts were just conductors of water.

To Mr. Mallin—I thought at the time I saw the water running that it was a filled drain.

To Mr. Irving—I pointed out the running water to Mr. Farmer at about ten o'clock; I believe that in consequence of the ditch not being properly formed in all ordinary showers, the water would soak through without doing any harm; it does not appear that in this, extraordinary one, the ditch carried off all the water; The difference between two and three feet of water would be carried off through the culvert; I have observed the locality before; I got off a train, then, at the Flamboro station, and walked to Dundas; I noticed this place then and thought that the grading of the ditch was insufficient; I thought then that this bank would go some day I don't think that any ditch has been cut there at all, nor any puddling done; I think it is in a state of nature; I am a builder; there might have been a ditch here; but I did not notice that any grade-work had been done with reference to forming a ditch.

To a Juror—I think a culvert would have prevented this accident.

To Mr. Irvine—I did not see any evidence of any grade-work having been done between the bank and the culvert.

The Coroner then informed the Jury that the closed the evidence. His said they had listened very attentively, and he was sure they had paid the greatest attention to it; it was now their duty to endeavour to fix to some party the responsibility for that to endeavour to fix to some party the responsibility for that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] population had not collected in this city popular unrest. A native of some 3, I think, a liberal allowance for that greatest unfed population of the three kingdoms, while in their palmiest days it did not probably exceed a third of Pere Hue's fabulous estimate of 1,500,000.

The appearance of four foreign ships, anchored close off the town, two of which towered over the surrounding river craft like Brobdignag ships-of-the-line among fleets of Lilliput, attracted immense crowds of spectators, many of whom had been frequenting till quite lately the water front, or sitting on the bund all week, to while on voyages of inspection, and were never tired gazing round the ships, as though they were specimens of naval architecture just arrived from an unknown neighbouring globe. The shopkeepers and persons generally with whom we conversed manifested a unanimous desire to trade, and expressed great satisfaction at learning that in all probability the port would soon be opened for the purpose. In the shops we observed a fair proportion of Manchester cottons, shirtings, piece goods, &c. In so hurried a visit, however, it was difficult to form any accurate estimate of the trading capabilities of the place beyond the patent fact that it was the entrepôt for the productions of the adjoining Provinces, and the most natural and convenient point from which any demand which might exist in them for foreign manufactures should be supplied. Among these productions tea, cotton, indigo, coal and sugar, are the most prominent; minerals of various descriptions, insect as vegetable wax, furs, hides, besides great quantities of flax, hemp, and cereals generally, are also important articles of inland traffic.

"On the 10th Lord Elgin, accompanied by about thirty diplomatic and naval officers, paid a visit of ceremony to Kwan, the Governor-General of the Provinces of Hunan and Hupeh, whose official residence is in Woohang. We were much struck with the appearance of the town, and the reception of the ambassador by the Governor-General was most flattering. His excellency was surrounded by all the provincial and civil authorities in their state dresses, and an elaborate entertainment was provided in a style far surpassing in elegance and taste the ordinary official banquet, which always plays so important a part in Chinese ceremonials. The visit was returned by the Governor-general on the following day.—The state junk was towed across the Yang-tze by half-a-dozen smaller craft and propelled by crowds of rowers; the fluttering of hundreds of gaudy Chinese flags with which they were decorated, the crowds of minor junks by which they were surrounded, the gay appearance of our ships, dressed out and with yards manned, the thunder of our salutes as it mingled with the small artillery of the junks, the dense crowds of people everywhere, and the bright autumn sun shining on all, combined to form a spectacle which to our eyes added to the charm of its brilliancy the interest of novelty, and which to the good folks of Hankow must have appeared an unrivalled and overwhelming pageant.

"On the following day we left Hankow on our return voyage, and proceeded most prosperously for the first thirty miles.—Soon, however, we discovered, to our dismay, that the river was rapidly falling, and that the sandbanks we had passed with such difficulty on our way up were now several feet above the surface. Thanks to the energy, skill, and indefatigable exertions of Captain Osborn, and the master of the Furious, Mr. Court, the Furious was forced over and after another of these obstacles; the Cruizer, most ably handled by Captain Bythesea, and drawing less water, followed more easily, while the gunboats proved invaluable pioneers, and were incessantly occupied in dashing fruitlessly about the river in vain endeavours to find deep water. At last, after a week had been spent in accomplishing 130 miles, and the Furious had established her reputation as a splendid goer across country, we reached the bar at the Poyang lake, on which there was now only eleven feet of water, and which, although her draught was reduced to fifteen feet, was a fence at which even the Furious did not feel justified in going. During the interval which had elapsed since our last visit the water had fallen seven feet at this point. It was therefore decided that Lord Elgin, accompanied by the entire mission, should abandon the Furious and Cruizer, and proceed with the Dove and Lee to rejoin the Retribution. The Dove started with twelve "cabin passengers" in the most literal sense of the term, for there was only one cabin for them, and the Lee with ten. On parting with the ship which had been Lord Elgin's home for the last year he addressed Captain Osborn, the officers, and men, in a farewell speech, and shed many regrets and leave-takings, and loud and prolonged cheers from both sides, the two little gunboats, with their closely packed freight, skimmed away down the rapid waters of the Yang-tze-Kiang.

"In two days we reached Naskin, but with our slender force the circumstances under which we were now approaching it were very different from those on the former occasion. "As the channel led us within fifty yards of a row of guns of which we had a lively recollection, and as the last thing we had communicated to these rebels was a cannon ball, it was deemed wise to send off a boat to discover the humor they were in; Mr. Wade therefore was despatched to demand an apology for the treatment we had received on the way up, and to inform them that a measure of such decided nature would become necessary for us to land a force only six miles from the town, and in the vicinity of the rebel camp. The result was that the rebels, who had commenced the attack, disclaimed all intention of hostility, and Mr. Wade landed, charged with a similar message, and accompanied by Messrs. Oliphant, Lay, and Mylne. These gentlemen then a long ride of five or six miles reached the encampment. They found the rebels to establish the city of Naskin, as we had supposed, for other bands of rebels had occupied the suburbs, and were in possession of the suburbs, and were in possession of the suburbs, and were in possession of ...ther thing) of which the sheep died, and they nearly all died, with a donkey and an ox which had been grazing in the field.—The ... died suddenly from the effects of the poison, which got into ... Justice Wilde summed up, and the Foreman left the jury must be finished upon whether this was a reasonable and fit compensation to be used according to the directions aforesaid in the verdict. If they thought that the loss of the sheep could be reasonably attributed to no other cause, than their verdict must be, for the plaintiff; but if the plaintiff had not made out this, then their verdict must be for the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages £14,000.

Legislation for the Ladies—1859.

The following proposed Act has been framed for the modification of the evening [illegible]:—

ANNO VICESIMO SECUNDO & VICESIMO TERTIO VICTORIÆ REGINÆ.

CAP. CDXCVIII.

An Act for the Reform and Regulation of Female Apparel, and to Amend and Re-enact the Customs relating to Crinoline and other Artificial Superfluities and the Profusion thereof, with the Powers, Provisions, Clauses, Regulations and Directions, Fines, Forfeitures, and Penalties, to be charged, applied, practised, and put in execution for ensuring the proper observance of the same.

[Session 1859.]

Whereas it has become necessary and expedient, for divers urgent reasons [illegible] after set forth and fully shown, that certain Customs relating to Crinoline and other articles of Female Dress should be regulated and reformed by Special Act, be it therefore enacted by and with the approbation of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, as follows;—

I. From and after the respective Times hereinafter appointed, the certain Potential Rights, Powers, Claims, &c., held by the Female Sex, by virtue of which they have chosen the pattern and configuration, and determined the shape and dimensions of their exterior habiliments, shall respectively cease and determine, and shall be, and the same are hereby repealed.

II. That from and after the passing of this Act no Female shall, under any pretence whatever, wear or immerse herself in a certain protruding Skeleton, Grating, or Gridiron-patron Under Skirt, nor any other anatomically formed framework, which shall be in diameter more than two yards, whether the same be made or fashioned out of Steel, Whalebone, Cane, Cord, Wickerwork, Caligut India-rubber, Gutta Percha, Wood, or any other material, fabric or substance, whether screwed together or fitted with hinges for the purpose of folding or shortening the dimensions thereof, nor shall the same be contractible or collapsible in any manner or form, whether the same shall be made after the pattern of an umbrella, or with radiating spikes, loaders, ribs, connections strings, or framing whatsoever, or any other complex machinery, by means of which the same may be drawn together, for the purpose of making way or facilitating the transit or passage room for any person to persons in the Public Streets, Parks, Bridges, Churches, Theatres, Doorways, Public Vehicles, Steam Vessels, or Private Apartments heretofore incommoded by reason of the artificiae and commodities caused thereby, under a penalty of Twenty Shillings for each time of offence, such sum to be levied by the offender, either at plain conviction or case-hardening, Stocks, Quarter Sessions or Police Charges, at the discretion of any sitting Magistrate.

III. That it shall not be lawful for any female above the age of forty-two, deck, or bedizen herself, in any under skirt or petticoat, the pattern of which shall be red and black striped, tub-or barrel pates, or any other pattern approaching to chess or draught board pattern, or any other pattern or colour which shall be likely to cause the shying fright of any horse, ox, or ass, or shall be calculated to cause the unnecessary barking of puppies, or dogs, forth the prejudiced remarks of any aged boys or charity girls of the present generation, who may enjoy the same, without the same remarks may be gratuitously delivered.

IV. That in any case where a female is a married woman, and under the age of fifty years, and has not been married thirty years, and a new article of dress is required (the necessity of which new dress shall be determined by her husband), a pattern or piece of the stuff or material shall be first obtained by her, or in case of illness by some person duly authorised by her, from the shopkeeper or person having the selling of the same, which pattern, together with a certificate stating the quantity to be purchased and the price thereof shall be submitted to the husband for approval within two days after the same shall be obtained, and the husband shall signify his approval of such pattern by a certificate in writing, and such certificate shall be delivered to the party selling such article aforesaid at the time of such purchase.

FORM OF CERTIFICATE.

I, Theophilus Brick, husband of Cæcilia Mary Ann Brick, hereby consent to the purchase of ten yards of silk, (jungle width), for a dress, at one shilling and eight pence per Yard, such silk to be of the same quality and colour as pattern hereunto annexed.

(Signed) Theophilus Brick.

73 Albert Buildings, 1859.

To Green Stocks, draper, Bathmeadow.

V. That where any unmarried female under the age of thirty shall require new articles of dress a certificate of either of the parents or if there only be one parent, the survivor of them shall be sufficient.

VI. Provided always that any husband or father purchasing any article or articles of female attire may certificate, as long as [illegible] the Act, and this must shall be observed and practised.

VII. Provided always that any female who has been in her grandeur, prior to the passing of this Act, any Frances, Hops [illegible] Skeleton Gratings, or Wicker-work, shall be at liberty [illegible] the Act, but the relation of the Memorial is not true. Engines of War.

When all the signs of the times portend war, and that on a desperate scale, the anxiety here and on the other side of the channel to perfect the engines of war is natural enough. No subject engages more attention at the present time, and never before was it prosecuted so earnestly. The effort which the Emperor of the French has long made to improve his artillery, especially oblige us to look to our own. He is said to have perfected a wonderful gun. We read, "It is rifled; the projectiles are hollow, and produce a double effect—that of solid shot and of shell. Their form is conical, and leaden sabettes give to the ball a precision never obtained before. In order to give an idea of the terrible effects of these new pieces, it suffices to say that a 12-pounder (new model) will, with one-half the number of shots of the old pieces of 24, produce the same effect; and the new pattern 12-pounder produces at 70 metres the same result as the old 24 at 33, and requires no more than one-sixth of the charge. The projectiles penetrate into a block of stone of the hardest cement, to an extent of 80 centimetres, and an enormous breach is made by the explosion. The advantages of the 4-pounder are still more remarkable. It requires but 580 grammes of powder to throw a ball a distance of one kilometrical league. The precision is such that at the distance of 3,100 metres it strikes a single man on horseback, and at but distance would destroy a body of cavalry or infantry." All the pieces constructed on the new system are loaded at the muzzle. Two hundred guns of this kind are already furnished to the Imperial Guard, and numbers of various calibre are being cast. One with which they are now practising at Vincennes is said to weigh 2,500lbs., and to require six men to work it. This gun can at 2,000 yards put 20 musket-balls in a target six feet square.

An Englishman, Mr. Shaw, claims to have invented an "Enfield rifle battery," consisting of twenty-four barrels, and weighing only 300 lbs., which can also put twenty balls in a target six feet square, at about the same distance; if this be so, we are prepared for the Vincennes gun in the field.

But the great secret of our Government at present is in the Armstrong gun, which has obtained for its inventor a baronetage and the appointment of "Engineer of the War Department for Rifled Ordnance." In order to secure the secret of this gun's construction, the Government suppressed Sir. W Armstrong's application for a patent, and will now have to bring in a bill specially that proceeding. Great care is taken to prevent any unauthorized person from seeing the gun. During practising strangers are kept at a distance, and when not in use is safely housed. It would appear however, that all these precautions proved useless; for the editor of the "Mechanics Magazine," like a patriot as he is, has given to the world a detailed description of the construction of the gun. We are told before that "it is formed of an internal steel tube, bound over with strips of rolled iron laid on spirally, somewhat after the fashion of small-arm barrels, the alternate strips being laid in opposite directions." The system of construction is expensive, but it gives great strength with small quantity of metal. The internal steel tube is rifled with a very large number of small grooves close to each other. The shot or shell Mr. Armstrong usually makes of cast iron, of about three diameters in length, and covers it entirely over with thin lead, so that it may conform itself to the rifled interior of the bore. The gun is loaded from the breech in a new and ingenious manner, and herein it would seem, is the chief excellence of the gun. With his shells Mr. Armstrong uses a percussion fuse of his invention, for causing the shell to burst on striking an object, in case the striking takes place before the fuse has operated. The Armstrong gun is much lighter compared with the shot she throws, than the best gun now in use; and as for effect, we are told that on this system shot or shell, weighing eighty or ninety pounds, are cast a distance of from five to seven miles.

Another war-engine which will probably be adopted in our naval service, is Captain Norton's Liquid Fire shell. It has already gone very successfully through experiments intended to prove that one or two of these missiles fired into the hull of a vessel would set it in flames. The shell was tried against some pieces of sacking, which represented the sails of a ship; and, though they were soaked with rain, they took fire immediately. The same result followed when a shell, charged with about a tea-spoonful of the "liquid fire," came in contact with a timber boarding.

Then we have Mr. Warry's Breech-loading Gun, which, on a recent trial, fired ten rounds in a minute, a distance of 2,000 yards and with good aim. What next? Already the list has been made almost impossible with these inventions, or at any rate a pitched battle in open field. Let us hope that somebody will devise a means of blowing armies away column by column; and then perhaps, we shall hear no more of warfare, save as a thing gone by.

Arrest of Fifteen Persons on Suspicion of passing Counterfeit Money.

From the Prototype.

The police station and the office of the chief, in the arcade yesterday exhibited a scene of the liveliest excitement, and an immense crowd blocked up the entrance to both places in such a manner that any effort to gain admission to either was accompanied with considerable degree of jostling and much difficulty, while the avenues leading thereto were thronged with persons anxious to learn the cause of such an unusual proceeding. The mystery was soon explained. A telegraph to the following effect, was sent on Tuesday from the Hamilton authorities, to the chief of police in this city:—

"Two men arrested in Toronto for passing counterfeit money; one left on Hamilton train and changed cars at the junction for the west. They had tickets for St. Joseph. Arrest and search them."

The despatch was received in London at three o'clock on the afternoon in question and without delay Mr. Stevens arranged his plans accordingly. He, with Constables Latham and the high bailiff, went down to the railway station, and upon the arrival of the day express, which, on account of the late accident, did not pass till about eight o'clock that evening, got aboard and accompanied the train as far as Komoke, by which time that official and his assistants, with the aid of Conductor Leonard, (who, we are informed, rendered every service in his power to the constables in the discharge of their duty) had "their man all marked." The first two that were arrested exhibited some little opposition, but after a while, finding their efforts in that way useless, as the chief was prepared for any emergency, they caused no further trouble. Fifteen in all were arrested, and were conveyed to this city in the next freight train that passed. Previous to taking the parties from the train each one was separately searched; in the matter of counterfeit money, there was we believe only a bogus four dollar bill found upon one; besides this, good bills and gold, American money to the amount of about $1,400, were found in the possession of the whole.

Each person was heavily armed with pistols, dirks, bowie knives and rifles; the firearms were all loaded, and might have been used with deadly effect, had the owners chosen to refuse to deliver themselves up. The total number of weapons taken in charge consisted of fifteen rifles, of excellent manufacture, eleven dirks, some of them beautifully gold and silver mounted, and thirteen revolvers, among which were a few of an old-fashioned description, and which were evidently made to 'presear,' not to kill. The parties arrested, from their general appearance, appear of quite a different class from that which the are suspected to be. They are evidently fa[illegible]ers, on their way to the west, and make [illegible] their intention of proceeding to the go[illegible] regions in the vicinity of Pike's Peak. They are all strangers in this country, and hail from some part of New York State, [illegible] a place called Chateaugy. Mr. Griffith of this city, is well acquainted with two or three of the young men, and represents them as being the sons of respectable farmers in the locality. It is, however, sufficiently plain that, found well armed, they are a harmless band of adventurers, about to seek their fortunes in a distant country, where no doubt such weapons are necessary for the protection of their persons and property.

As we anticipated, the whole affair terminated, to use an elegant expression, in "a flash in the pan." The authorities here on learning that they had no power to detain the party, discharged them, and they all proceeded on their way, rejoicing. They left London, and continued their journey by the afternoon train.

The Armstrong Gun.

(From the Mechanics' Magazine.)

Instead of being cast like ordinary cannon—or formed of several longitudinal pieces like the Whitworth cannon—or of a hooped or wire-bound tube as proposed by Captain Blakely, Mr. Mallet, and others—the new gun is formed of an internal steel tube, bound over with strips of rolled iron laid on spirally, somewhat after the fashion of small-arm barrels, the alternate strips being laid in opposite directions, so that the joints may cross each other, or, in other words, so as to "break joint." This system of construction is, of course, expensive, but it gives great strength with a very small quantity of metal. The internal steel tube is rifled in a very peculiar manner. Instead of having two, three or four grooves, like ordinary rifled guns—or being formed with an oval bore like that employed by Mr. Lancaster, or with a polygonal bore, as in the Whitworth system, it has a very large number of small grooves close to each other, so less than forty, we believe, in a gun of 2½ inches' bore. The shot or shell Mr. Armstrong usually makes of cast-iron, of about three diameters in length, and covers it entirely over with thin lead, so that it may readily conform itself to the rifled interior of the bore when forced forward by the explosion of the charge. Provision for loading the gun at the breach is made by cutting a slot near the breech end down from the upper side into the bore, of a sufficient length to admit the elongated projectile and the charge of powder, and of a breadth slightly greater than the diameter of the bore. The bore itself is also slightly enlarged when it opens into the space formed by cutting out the slot, in order that the projectile and the powder, after being lowered into the slot, may be easily pressed forward by hand or other means into the bore. In order to close the space formed by the slot after the gun is charged, a moveable breech-piece is formed to fit into it, and is furnished with two handles, by means of which it may be lifted out and dropped into its place as required. This breech-piece has fitted to its front face a facet of copper, a portion of which projects slightly, so as to form a disc which, when the breech-piece is forced a little forward, will enter the bore behind the charge, and, by its expansion at the moment of explosion, prevent all escape of gas. The slight shock, produced by the forward of the breech-piece is effected by means of a strong screw passing in through the extreme breech-end of the gun, and pressing against the rear end of the breech-piece. This screw is turned by a hand-lever. The fore-end of the breech-piece is bored out at the centre, the bore extending through the copper disc, and into this bore is placed at the time of loading a small discharging cartridge. The "touch-hole," or hole for the detonating plug, is formed in the breech-piece, passing down from its upper side into its bore; so that when the piece is to be discharged the detonating cap or plug is struck, the small discharging cartridge is thereby fired, and its fire is instantaneously communicated to the main cartridge in the bore of the gun itself. With the shells Mr. Armstrong uses a percussion fuse of his invention for causing the shell to burst on striking an object, in case the striking takes place before the time-fuse has operated. This percussion fuse has been already described in our pages, but may fitly be again referred to here. In a cylindrical case within the shell Mr. Armstrong fixes a weight or striker, by means of a pin passing through it and the sides of the case. This pin is cut or broken by the shock which the projectile receives in the gun at the instant of firing, and the striker being thus liberated recedes to the rear end of the case, and there remains until the velocity of the shell is checked by coming into contact with some object. When this takes place the striker, not participating in the retardation of the shell, advances in the case, and causes a patch of detonating composition to be carried suddenly against a fixed point, which fires the composition and ignites the bursting charge in the shell.

Let us now glance at some of the effects which the introduction of the Armstrong gun is likely to produce; and, as the advantages which a light, long-range gun must possess as a military weapon will be pretty evident to every one, let us regard it more particularly in its relations to naval warfare. Experiments have already shown that a 32-pounder gun, constructed upon Mr. Armstrong's system, has a greater range and fires with greater accuracy than any gun at present in use in the navy; and yet, while the former weighs but 26 cwt., the present 68-pounder weighs no less than 95 cwt. We may therefore at once reduce the weight of our naval guns by nearly three-fourths, without impairing their range or aim. This would enormously increase the facility of handling them, and therefore leave us free to greatly reduce the number of men employed to work them. Again, with the breech-loading arm it would probably be found possible to get rid of the running out and in of the gun while in action, by counteracting the recoil in some suitable way, and for this reason, also, the number of men required to work them might be very much below the present staff. Again, both the bore and the thickness of metal of the gun being greatly reduced, the external diameter of the gun will be so small that very small ports only would be necessary, and this would add materially to the safety of the gunners, especially in close action. Another advantage might be gained in the use of certain guns, particularly the bow-chase guns on board ship. It is always a matter of great difficulty to give such a form to the ship that the muzzles of the guns may, when the guns are run out, project sufficiently far to carry the fire of the ports clear of the vessel. With the long, slight Armstrong gun this difficulty would not be experienced. But, on the other hand, the Armstrong shell is not to be compared, for destructive effect, with the round shells now used in the navy. The charge of powder which it contains is far too small for this. Nor does the Armstrong projectile penetrate thick iron plates, as some suppose. It is found to have but little effect upon them, and this is probably one reason why both the French and English governments are just now so anxious for the construction of iron-plated ships of war, which can be successfully devised.—That Admiralty have the means of penetrating iron plates we are prepared confident to state; but the Armstrong gun is not a gun they would use for the purpose.

And before we conclude we would explain that there is no magic about the peculiar combination of parts which we have explained in describing the gun. The success of the gun depends solely upon the efficient manner in which the projectile is caused to fill exactly the bore of the piece. This accuracy is never be obtained in muzzle-loading guns. With breech-loaders, however, it is not difficult to secure it. Any well-constructed breech-loading cannon would give good results; although Mr. Armstrong's ad-vanced projectile has undoubtedly great advantages. Whether the contact of the two metals will detonate the projectile, if kept in store long, has yet to be seen.

[illegible] for the Napoleon gold-piece, of which the Emperor has 200 already completed for the Imperial Guard, we do not believe it will at all approach the Armstrong piece in any of any kind. It is merely a two-grooved 4-pounder bore-piece, with round shell de to fit the grooves.

Universal Suffrage and America.

From the London Times.

We shall be told that in the United States universal Suffrage works well, and that the great majority of the people, their great material resources, and the diffusion of education among them are proofs of the vitality and spirit of Democracy. This is one of the most important questions for the European politician, and it is likely to be debated many a year to come. In Universal Suffrage the cause of American prosperity? Is it likely to be permanent in the soil of the Old World? Does it tend to raise the estimable qualities of man to political power? And, presuming that the answers to these questions is favorable as regards America, is it likely that the adoption of such a system would succeed in a country like ours? Is it not merely necessary to point to Mr. Disraeli's bill and the agitation for Mr. Bright; they reguard matters of great moment, and affect the whole fabric of the country.—The question may be simply put as follows: Does the ordinary political doctrines of men in this country, and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, which are recognised as self-evident truths in the United States? For, if the latter question ought to be answered in the negative, the advantages ought to be themselves obvious to borough as one of those that were disfranchised by the Act of 1832. (Cheers.)

[illegible] Americans," which [illegible] seems, gives a fair [illegible] We have no wish [illegible] institutions of America, [illegible] they exist, the [illegible] among which [illegible] and [illegible] in their village halls, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Considering on the present light franchise, Mr. Bright quoted a letter from a working man, having a saving-bank, to show how it operated, the writer (for you see he speaks quite in commercial language) stating that that capacity which he paid in 1849, amounted to £20, in 1857 it reached £10.?? sailings, times. Then came a time for falling back on his little hoard, and the depositor returned to £5. Then he imagine[d] [illegible] laborious life, laboring from morning till night, putting scanty savings by, during almost many perfectly innocent enjoyments, at length succeeded in grasping together £20; then the sickness of a child, or perhaps the loss of employment from a commercial panic, shrinks his little fund to £5. You see his anxiety, and almost his agony, as it is gradually being extinguished. His odds, "And so it goes on decreasing or increasing, as our [illegible] necessities compel us to draw upon it, with other many struggles, it rises to £30." Then he had a piece of good fortune which does not fall to everybody. A [illegible] of his who died, left them a small sum, just enough to bring him within the pale of this new constitution. (Much laughter and cheering.) Then he goes on to say, "I am bold enough to assert that I was as capable of exercising the franchise when I had only £5, as I now am when I have £60." (Cheers.) He proceeds:—"Another objection is this—that if I think proper to withdraw that amount, and place it in a building society, or in some other eligible investment, I lose my qualification as a citizen; if a friend should want to borrow a few pounds from me—as often happens in all classes of society—if I oblige him I shall also be disfranchised."—I had another letter from a man living either in Portsmouth or Plymouth, who tells me he happens to have as much money in the savings' bank as will qualify him under the bill. "Nobody," he says, "beyond you and myself knows of this fact. Is it necessary that any small pecuniary transaction, any condition with regard to my savings, should be published to my neighbours in this town? Suppose you were to carry the rule through all the different classes of society, I say it is an insulting and absurd proposition, which ought to be rejected by the unanimous voice of the country." (Cheers.)

Referring to the Duke of Wellington's statement in 1831 and 1832 that there was no necessity for reform, Mr. Bright said:—But the Duke of Wellington himself, with all his courage and all his robustness of denial, never told you that it was necessary to go back if he never offered you a bill which would make your representation worse; he never proposed to disfranchise[illegible] of 50,000 freeholders in England and Wales; he never said, putting you on your back, "put £5 in the savings'-bank, save £6 a year for ten years, excellent citizens of Great Britain as you are, and at the end of that time your name shall be written down in the voters' list of Birmingham, and you shall have the tenth-thousandth part of a member in the House of Commons."—(Laughter and cheers.)

The Government, he said, "feared" to admit the people to the franchise.

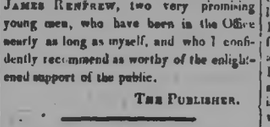
They know that the power in this country—the power of taxing and the power of living on the taxes—(laughter)—is a monopoly in the hands of a few hundred families. They believe, and with reason, that if there were a fair representation of opinions in the House of Commons, that monopoly which has existed for the last 200 years would be broken up,—that the public eye would be on every part of it—that the hand of a strong, intelligent people would have laid of the reins—and that the fat[illegible] those few hundreds of families [illegible] £70,000,000 of annual taxation would be put an end to forever. (Loud cheers.) Let me call your attention just to one point on this matter. You have seen in the newspapers, in the course of the last fortnight, that the First Lord of the Admiralty, without any dissent on the part of the House, has proposed to add another million during the present year to the expenditure on the navy. I am not discussing in the least whether that addition is or is not proper at this moment; but it is a fact worth knowing that within the last 20 years no less than £170,000,000 sterling has been cast into that insatiable maw which we call the navy. If the people of England had been fairly represented in the House of Commons long before this we should have had a ransacking of everything connected with the navy and admiralty.

If the bill were not rejected he would never again take his seat in the House of Commons; he would despair of all classes. He anticipated, however, that the Bill would be rejected, that the Government would fall.

If Lord Derby resigns, there will be, as there always has been, a successor. There are two men to whom little sections in the House of Commons look up with anxiety and with hope. Both of them cannot be sent for at the same moment, and, judging from the fact that the crisis has occurred, or is likely to occur, on the question of Reform, I presume that the minister whose name is associated with this question is most likely to be the future minister. But now, although I have admitted before that I believe the sympathies and opinions of Lord John Russell are distinctly in favor of popular liberty and in favor of some real improvement in our representative system, just bear in mind that a minister is not a mimic or of the Crown nor a minister of the people. He is the minister of the sovereign, whether it be Lord Derby with his followers, or Lord John Russell with his. If he were unwise to give the people a real, substantial, undeniable measure of reform, I myself am, you must bear in mind that all those around him in the same rank and class do not fall on this occasion as I fall, or even as the noble lord feels. It is not in the power of any minister to do even what an honest minister might wish to do, unless there be an uprising of opinion throughout all classes of the population.—(Cheers.) You men of Birmingham, you men of the national reception, united with the people [illegible] of Lancashire, and the West Riding, and with the [illegible] you

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE "WEEKLY GLOBE."
GEORGE WINER, BRADENS, &c—
HENRY CHAPMAN & Co.



The Examiner.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7TH, 1859

TO THE PATRONS OF THE "EXAMINER."

It becomes my duty to announce to you that my connection with the Examiner ceases with the present number. In separating myself from its control, I cannot refrain from expressing the satisfaction it has afforded me of addressing, through its columns, so intelligent and patriotic a community as the inhabitants of the County of Peterborough. How far I have succeeded in making its reading interesting to them, and of establishing a public journal worthy of their patronage, is a matter that I am not in a position to offer an opinion upon; but this I do claim: that I have ever consulted the honest interests of the people; and never neglected a fitting occasion to call attention to the censurable conduct of public personages. In withdrawing from the honorable profession of journalism, I may be allowed to remind my readers of the close connection always to be preserved between "the People," and "the Press," and their reciprocal obligation to support with affectionate zeal the palladium of their liberties. Those renegade members, who prostitute themselves to every impure influence to gain a livelihood, however detestable to honest minds, are but an exception, and ought not to be permitted to detract from the merits of the profession. As a rule, journalism is an honest calling, always preferring the approbation of the people, and only belying its true nature, when neglected, where it has a right to look for succour. The remedy is with the people; let it be duly applied. Then will our rulers have only that power which the public safety requires.

In contemplating a retirement from the labors of a public journalist, I have still consulted the interests of this community in the selection of the persons who will succeed me, and I now have great pleasure in introducing, as the future managers of this paper, Mr. ALEXANDER GRAHAM and Mr. JAMES RENFREW, two very promising young men, who have been in the Office nearly as long as myself, and who I confidently recommend as worthy of the enlightened support of the public.

COBOURG ASSIZES!!

WIFE POISONING CASE!

TRIAL OF DR. KING.

BEFORE JUDGE BURNS.

COBOURG, Tuesday, April 5.

This morning the trial of Dr. King of Brighton for the alleged murder of his wife, Mary Anne King, was commenced. The case is a remarkable one, both in a criminal and scientific point of view. If the prisoner be found guilty, another instance will be added to those already on record wherein a knowledge of medicine has been put to the worst possible purpose—wherein the physician has cruelly, persistently and remorselessly used his skill for the destruction of life under the pretence of saving, wherein the husband has stood by the bedside of his dying wife, and while speaking to her words of comfort, and of hope, has betrayed her to a gradual and painful death. If the accused be guilty, science will vindicate itself by bringing down punishment upon the man who has abused the sacred trust placed in his hand; if innocent, it in by its aid that the falsity of accusation must be proved.

As this case bids fair to become famous in Canadian criminal records; a short account of the parties principally concerned, may not be out of place. William Henry King was born in the township of Sophiasburg, Prince Edward Co., in the year 1835.—In 1844, his parents removed to Cramahe, now Brighton, in Northumberland where they commenced farming. By industry and perseverance, they succeeded in accumulating a considerable amount of property. When eighteen years of age, King left home, and went to the Normal school in Toronto. While there he studied medicine and having obtained a first class certificate, was appointed teacher of the fourth division of the Central School, Hamilton, in which situation it was part of his duty to lecture to the students on physiology. Thinking he might better his condition, by gaining such an acquaintance with the healing art, as would enable him to practice with success, he studied under Dr. Greenlaus, and in 1856 in pursuance of this determination to obtain medical knowledge, he went to Philadelphia, where we find him during the winter months of the years 1856, '57, and '58—the pecuniary means necessary for the purpose being supplied him by his father-in-law Mr. Lawson. As proof of the assiduity with which he pursued his studies, he produces three diplomas; one from the Homœpathic Medical College Pennsylvania; a second from the Pennsylvania Medical University of Philadelphia; and a third from Eclectic Medical College, also of Philadelphia. In 1856, he returned to the village of Brighton, and immediately commenced the practice of medicine. In this he seems to have been very successful, and at least to have gained the confidence of the people. His receipt it is reported, averaged $900 per month, and, as he himself says, he was "in a fair way to achieve both fame and wealth," when the events which led to his arrest took place. By those who have known him, Dr. King is said to have been a retiring, energetic young fellow. Proud of his attainments, and possessing the gift of inspiring others with the belief that he was deeply learned in his profession, so far as practicable—but who just did start to succeed in the profession his hardworkers, so far as making money was concerned. He is described, while in England, in being of a rather quarrelsome disposition, fond of argument, and of a somewhat overbearing manner. He is married to a daughter of Mr. Lawson, who is also a native of Brighton, and has a family of two children, the eldest of whom is about five years of age. Mrs. King is described as a lady of very prepossessing appearance, and of amiable disposition. She is a member of the Society of Friends, and a native of Hallowell township, Prince Edward Co. He came to his present farm more than forty years ago. Miss Garrett is about the same age as Miss Vandervoort. With both these young ladies King exchanged letters. From what transpired before the coroner's inquest, it would appear that Miss Garret sharply checked the Doctor for his attentions. He had sent her a note to the effect that his wife must soon die, and asking Miss Garrett to hold herself in readiness to take Mrs. King's place. A very proper reply was returned, in which the young lady threatened to expose King if he dared to make any further advances of a like description. In the beginning of October, Mrs. King became seriously ill; her husband, it is said, having announced to her a short time previously, and, much to her surprise that she would not live a month. On the third of November she died; her husband having attended her unremittingly. During her illness, she frequently vomited after taking the medicines he administered. The retching was violent in the extreme, and caused her great pain. Many times did she beg of her husband to withhold the medicine he regularly prepared and constantly administered. He would entreat her to take it as the only means by which her life could be saved. If guilty of the deed with which he stands charged, no man ever played the hypocrite to a greater extent than Dr. King. Frequently would he implore Divine aid on the efforts he was professedly making to restore his wife to health; when speaking of her, he used the most affectionate language, and it appeared to be his study to do all in his power to alleviate her sufferings. A few days, however, before she died, a brother of Mrs. King happened to examine the pockets of a coat belonging to the Doctor, and in one of them he found a likeness of the above-mentioned Miss Vandervoort, accompanied by a note from the lady herself. This he did not make known until his sister was dead, but when once out, it brought to light the affair with Miss Dorcas Garrett. Still further to excite suspicion it was ascertained that King had purchased half an ounce of arsenic a day or two before his wife was taken ill; and subsequently to that, a quantity of morphine. A coroner's jury was summoned, and the body exhumed.—Evidence was adduced to show that while his wife was ill, King had declared that she was suffering from an ulcerated womb; but the medical men could find no trace of any such disease. They discovered that she was pregnant, but all connected with that part of the system was in a healthy condition. They could not account for death upon any other supposition than that it had been caused by poison. The stomach and liver were accordingly taken out, and sent to Professor Croft, Toronto, for analysis, whose evidence will be found below.—When the body was exhumed, King was visiting some patients, and upon returning to Brighton, after hearing what was going on he drove off at once to Sydney, to Mr. Vandervoort's where he arrived late at night. The family were much excited at his visit, and especially when he explained his reasons for making it. He told them of the inquest upon the body of his wife; said not only would he be arrested, but that a warrant would be issued for Miss Vandervoort also; and urged upon her parents that they should allow their daughter to fly with him to the States until the matter was settled. After much hesitation they acceded to the demand, upon the understanding that King should take Miss Vandervoort to her aunt's, at Cape Vincent.—This plan was adopted, but King's stay was short. A warrant was issued for his arrest, and while the enquiry was proceeding he was brought back, and lodged in prison.

Since his committal by the Coroner, Dr. King has been practising much entirely for himself. The Rev. S. D. Chamberlain attempted to defend him, and it is said to have received $2000 from him in advance, but by a understanding that he is to receive $5000 if he succeeds in clearing his client. $2000 have already been spent on behalf of the accused.

Mr. Galt, Q. C. appears for the Crown.—Medical men of eminence have been summoned from the United States, among whom are Professor Hempel and Dr. Landis of Philadelphia.

Drs. Vantassel of Brantford, and Nichol of Simcoe, are also here. On behalf of the Crown—Professor Croft, and Drs. Hodder and Bethune of Toronto; Geddes and Proctor of Brighton, and Gilchrist of Hamilton have been summoned. When before the Grand Jury, King preserved an unruffled demeanor. He declares he is quite sure of acquittal, and appears to be so. He laughs at the idea of being convicted—and really appears to think such a result to be quite impossible. The opinion out of doors is decidedly against him.

One day last week, a brother of the accused came to Cobourg and called at a chemist's shop, where he purchased twenty-five cents worth of strychnine. Upon being asked his name, he replied it was King, and admitted his relationship to the Doctor.—From the shop he went to the prison, where he saw his brother. The gaolor was present during the interview, and as the two were allowed to converse only though a small hole in the cell door, he is quite sure nothing was handed from one to the other. King explains that the strychnine was purchased for the purpose of poisoning foxes, of which there are many about his father's farm. Excuses of this description are always at hand.

The trial is creating the most intense excitement not only in Cobourg and neighbourhood but in all the country round about. At an early hour large numbers of heavily laden teams came into town, the railways also contributed their quota, and soon after eight o'clock the steep steps leading up to the Court House, and the brow of the hill upon which it stands, were covered with a crowd, jammed together as tight as it was possible for human beings to be. It was a noisy crowd, with great strength of lungs, which they tested to their utmost extent. Not once or twice, but continuously—indeed, one might have thought from the sustained roar that an election meeting was being held. Numbers of women came into Cobourg, but a glance at the Court House steps was sufficient to assure them that ermine could not bear so great an amount of compression, and they at once abandoned all hops of effecting an entrance. None were admitted except by the express permission of the sheriff, and the room was soon filled to its full extent. There were probably about three hundred people present. Among them, besides the witnesses, are a number of medical gentlemen and the students of the Cobourg Medical College, to whom a holiday has been given in order to permit their attendance. The Court House is small, low, ill-lighted, and worse ventilated. Mr. Justice Burns is stuck on a slightly elevated platform, behind a concern which looks very like an old counter borrowed from a chandler's shop.

The Court was opened at half-past nine o'clock—Mr. Galt, Q. C., who has been conducting the Crown cases this assize, prosecutes, assisted by the County Attorney, Mr. J. A. Armour. Hon. J. H. Cameron appears for the defence.

THE WOUNDED BY THE LATE ACCIDENT.—Mr. McLeise had been gradually sinking during the last week from the pain and constitutional irritation, arising from his severe injuries. It became at length absolutely necessary to amputate the limb to give him a chance of life. The poor fellow having consented, the operation was performed on Saturday last. He was placed under the influence of chloroform, and Dr. Billings, assisted by Drs. O'Reilly and Rosebrugh, removed the limb in a few minutes; he was returned to bed before he had returned consciousness. The amputation had to be done very high up the thigh, which, added to his weak state, rendering the case more dangerous. Upon waking up the sufferer expressed his surprise at all being over; thanked Dr. Billings for his kindness and skill, and said he had regretted very much he had not consented sooner.—Mr. Younker's fractured thigh is doing very well, and Henry Fisher is now quite recovered. Mr. Cook is now fast recovering.

Arrival of the New York.

THE REFORM BILL.

AFFAIRS IN EUROPE.

NEW YORK, April 5.

The steamship New York, from Bremen via Southampton on the 22nd ult., arrived here this morning.

The steamship Canada had arrived out on the 21st ult.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons, on Monday night, Lord John Russell moved his amendment to the Reform Bill, "that it is neither just nor politic to interfere with the freehold franchise," &c. The purport had already been received. After some debate the matter was adjourned till Tuesday.

A large meeting of working men had been held in Hyde Park, to oppose the Reform Bill.

The Neapolitan exiles had arrived at Bristol.

The quays were crowded with people to receive them, and considerable enthusiasm was manifested.

FRANCE AND ITALY.

The Paris correspondents say that the Emperor having been informed of the ultimate resolutions of Austria, is desirous to recede by diplomatic means, from his aggressive attitude.

Another letter says that Austria and France appear more inclined towards a pacific solution. It is certain, however, that Austria's force in Lombardy is more imposing than was generally thought.

Paris telegrams say that the Powers have agreed to a European conference, but the basis of the discussion cannot be settled.

INDIA.

The Bombay mail of February 2nd was telegraphed.

Kholaiba has been captured without a blow.

Tantia Topee was still at large.

The Neapolitan Exiles.

The victims of King Ferdinand's long-protracted cruelty at length breathe the air of a free land. The rights of citizenship in the country of their birth are still denied them; but the security and comfort of domicile in a land where espionage, arbitrary imprisonment, and torture are unknown are offered them with a cordial welcome by the greatest and freest nation in the world.—No sooner was it known that Panza and his companions had landed in Ireland, having by a vessel but of mystery on board the ship, whose captain had undertaken to transport them to America, broken the back of their native chains, there was [illegible] of satisfaction and [illegible] precedent among all [illegible] of Cork but on them in [illegible] Express [illegible] generosity in [illegible] that by a [illegible] £2000 [illegible] £3000 [illegible] £5000 have already been spent on behalf of the accused.

priesthood [illegible] during the exiled band, and the [illegible] conversation of his Protestant fellow-[illegible] seem to have approved of his promptit[illegible] offices of hospitality. As the care-w[illegible] many of whom were men of [illegible] all of them men of education, di[illegible] from the American vessel, and [illegible] their way through the streets of th[illegible] and reception "City of the Rive[illegible] Englishmen, especially [illegible] the objects of [illegible] instinctive solicitude and respect. Many kind and graceful attentions were paid to them during their sojourn there; and their civic host has done honour to himself and to his town, by becoming the first to enter his name on the subscription for one hundred guineas, which is intended to provide for the immediate necessities of the less opulent of the refugees.

In the course of the last few days many of the best and highest of our public men in England have agreed to form themselves into a committee of solace and of succour; and some thousands have already been subscribed in aid of this praise-worthy purpose. Men of both parties in the State, and of every variety of sentiment in religious matters, appear willing to co-operate in the good work. We cannot affect to approve, indeed, of the terms, almost apologetic, in which Lord Shaftesbury thought fit to inform a contemporary of his willingness to act as chairman. For ourselves we should have preferred seeing a man of a different stamp placed at the head of those who desire to make this national offering. On the other hand, however, it is generally understood that a few individuals possess in so high a degree the neck of getting other people to subscribe for any public object, and there are in the list of names already published sufficiently numerous guarantees that nothing of a party or sectarian colour will be imparted to the movement.

So many years have elapsed since Peerl, Settembrini, Spavanti, and their companions in suffering were taken from their families and thrown into the loathsome dungeons of Naples, that the busy and prosperous world has half forgotten the occasion of their misfortune, and has only been kept in mind of their cruel fate by protests at intervals, like those of Mr. Gladstone, and other earnest though less eloquent advocates of mercy. To the mercy of King Bomba they appealed, however, in vain, and the unfortunate gentlemen whose arrival amongst us we have now the unlooked-for happiness of celebrating, might have continued to pine and slowly perish in their rayless cells hewn out of the cold rock, and for the most part below the level of the sea, had not a passing pang of selfish fear shot through the despot's breast, and impelled him to do something which might have the effect of propitiating the alienated opinion of Europe.

To what extent the secret counsels of Austria may have predisposed him to relax his gripe upon the throat of these grievously injured men we know not, perhaps we shall never know. It is enough for us that after an incarceration in chains for ten weary years, in the most loathsome of prisons, upon charges varying in every degree of constructive disaffection to the worst government in Christendom, they are at length indebted for their liberation solely to considerations of expediency on the part of the Neapolitan court, and that their release has in no one instance been purchased by any humiliating admissions on the part of the wronged that their original accusation was just, or that they have sought forgiveness for the acts done and words spoken by them. For aught we know, some of their number may have been excitable and incautious men. The times and circumstances in which they were thrown were full of provocation. It was in May and June, 1849, that most of them were arrested upon charges of disaffection to the Government of Ferdinand, then embarked in the full tide of reaction. For many months the Neapolitans had been forced to behold their beautiful city made a scene of political terrorism and despair. In the spring of the previous year they had been tantalised with the apparent realization of their long looked for dream of constitutional government.—Their faithless monarch had conceded a Representative Chamber and a House of Peers, without whose legislative assent he had solemnly sworn that he would never again attempt to govern; a free press had been established and a national guard.—Above all, Ferdinand had, by the advice of his ministers, solemnly declared in favour of Italian independence, and sent an army under General Pepe to aid the Piedmontese in driving the Austrians out of Italy. But within three months, the King had proved his utter insincerity in all the pledges he had given, and all the promises he had made. On the 15th of May, 1848, the soldiery, whose minds had been worked upon previously by royal emissaries, suddenly fell upon the populace, whom they butchered without remorse, and then proceeded to sack and burn the houses of the leading Liberals of Naples, some of whom perished on that dreadful day, while others saved themselves only by flight. The massacre began before noon, and did not cease till long after sunset. In vain the representatives of Foreign Powers besought Ferdinand to stay the carnage, and recall the janissaries. The administration, at which Poerio had up to that time been a member, ceased to exist, and was succeeded by one composed of very different men. Nevertheless, for a time, the perfidious King endeavoured to dissemble, and permitted the Parliament to meet: their advice, however, was systematically spurned; the press was subjected anew to the old method of police direction; the national guard was dissolved; and the same in name the Government of Naples reverted to the ancient ways of absolutism. This state of things lasted until the battle of Novara had been fought and lost by Charles Albert, and the fate of Northern Italy appeared to be irrevocably sealed.—With a French army in Rome, and an Austrian garrison in Florence, Ferdinand no longer feared to throw off all semblance of disguise, and to wreak his vengeance without stint or stay upon the patriotic men who had persuaded him for a brief season to be human and just. Carlo Poerio was among the first marked out for destruction. In common with Settembrini, well known as the author of the National Petition to the King, Spavanti, and many other members of the suppressed Parliament, he was arraigned before a special tribunal created by royal edict, and before which he and his associates were illegally compelled to appear. Forged letters and every species of [illegible] testimony were resorted to [illegible] accusers. Their doom was [illegible] only many of them were [illegible] death, but their sentences were [illegible] to imprisonment in irons for twenty years or for life. The details of the misery they have since endured have become familiar to our ears. But we think Heaven that their misery is at length at an end, and that dying [illegible] countenances the proud and guilty system of Bourbon power ceased to protect against it.

Law and Crime.

An adjourned hearing took place on Saturday last, at Bow street, of certain charges brought against John Gibson Bennett, who under the pseudonyms of Dr. Walters Dr. Colston, "house surgeon," and others has for some time been carrying on an extensive system of fraud, by means of advertisements to cure deafness in ten minutes. It may be remembered that his plans were a short time since exposed through the medium of the Westminster County Court on a plaint brought to recover £5 5s., paid to him by one of his victims. The man appears to have been for some time past living in great style at Richmond; and after the report just mentioned appeared in the journals to have had the audacity to publish handbills offering £50 reward for the discovery of persons propagating statements to his discredit. At the first hearing of the case at Bow Street, which was founded upon his having received moneys under false pretences, the defendant did not appear, although represented by counsel and attorney. His attorney, a Mr. Haynes, undertook that he, Bennett, should be present on the adjourned hearing, and, on this understanding, the magistrate postponed the case. On the adjournment, neither the defendant nor Mr. Haynes were present.—The last-named sent his son, who stated that his father had no further instructions. The magistrate thereupon allowed evidence to be taken in support of an application for a warrant, and this evidence disclosed a series of the most revolting impositions and extortions. It was proved that for cases of "mixture" delivered from "The British and Foreign Ear Infirmary," the defendant had actually received sums varying from five to a hundred pounds, according to the wealth and gullibility of the patient. These mixtures, moreover, were proved, not only by chemical analysis, but by oral testimony to consist exclusively of urine and alum.—False testimonials, signed with false names, had been promulgated by Bennett and his confederates, testifying to his success in curing deafness of "twenty-three years' standing." His brother, William Bennet, had assisted him in his nefarious practices. On one occasion, William Bennett, under the name of Dr. Bennett, had sent his assistant to the house of a respectable old gentleman at Notting Hill, who had been duped into placing himself in the quack's hands. While Bennett remained at a neighbouring tavern, drinking there, two glasses of brandy-and-water, his accomplice was busy rubbing the filthy "mixture" into the intoxicated dupe's back. For this operation £12 12s. was charged. "I think," observed Bennet on this occasion, "that I must let Mr. K—— off for twelve guineas, but if I can drop it into him for more, I will." The two brothers were shown to have been at one time in the billiard and "card-sharping" line.—Warrants were granted for their apprehension. An indictment, on which the grand jury have since found a true bill, was laid against them at the Middlesex Session, and in this indictment, Mr. Haynes, attorney, is reported to have been included, on what grounds does not at present appear. Meanwhile, in illustration of a curious fact which we have several times, had occasion to remark, that of the simultaneous development of kindred species of crime, at the exact period when these disclosures were being made in London, Baron Watson was trying a quack at Winchester, for manslaughter. The prisoner, Benjamin Crook, resided at Marlborough, Wiltshire, had professed to cure cancerous diseases. An unfortunate man was afflicted with a cancerous tumor, the size of an egg, upon his neck. His case had been given over as hopeless by experienced surgeons. He sprinkled over the swelling some powder, which had the effect of making the part, according to the evidence, "begin to swell and steam wonderfully." The wonder might have been less, had it been known that the application consisted of corrosive sublimate (bi-chloride of mercury), the most powerful of metallic corrosive irritants, compared to the application of which, that of lunar caustic, vitrol, or the "actual cautery" by red-hot iron, might have been a harmless, anodyne.—The unhappy patient became, instantly frantic with agony, and endured fearful torments for nine days, when he perished from the absorption of the poison into his system. The prisoner was convicted, and sentenced to three month's imprisonment, without hard labour. For the levity of his sentence he had to thank witness who deposed to his having cured them of somewhat similar disorders. The fact at once reveals to us one of the greatest foundations upon which ignorant quackery generally rests. Every quack doctor, not a double counterfoil, as in the case of Bennett, can boast and produce occasional cures. The reason is, that as a rule most ordinary diseases have a tendency to cure themselves. Disease generally is in itself an effort of nature towards the expulsion of its exciting cause. Even the pills of the most notorious pillmongers can boast scores of testimonials, by attentive patients of the great hoc propter hoc, school of logicians. As an invariable rule, the public should mistrust medical advertisements of all kinds. Advertising doctors are no less dangerous than advertising lawyers, or advertising borrowers of money "for which ample security will be given." The wise will beware of all three.

The increase of disturbances manifested civilians, by drunken soldiers using their bodies as weapons of defence, has become recently frightful. The latter has in vain been brought under the notice of the military authorities, who have only responded to appeals from the magistracy and the press by an absurdly inefficient order—depriving the warriors of the privilege of wearing belts after the ridiculous hour of nine o'clock. On Saturday night last, a dreadful fate was committed in the crowded thoroughfare of the New Cut, Lambeth by a party of intoxicated Guardsmen, who fell indiscriminately upon all within their reach—police and passengers, whether men, women, or children. The force in which the fellows mustered, and the ferocity and disgraceful nature of the weapons wielded by them, protected them from capture; but they were subsequently identified, principally by means of their belts, which, stained with blood, gave sufficient indication, of the nature of their night's amusement.—Three of them have been thus arrested and await their punishment. Another soldier was charged at the Mansion-house, on Monday, with using his belt in a murderous attack upon a policeman, who offered not the slightest provocation. Since it appears utterly useless to trust to the military authorities for the simple prevention of these brutal attacks upon unoffending persons, it is to be hoped that some member of Parliament will bring the matter before the House, with a view to the repression of the offence, the mere possibility of the continued commission of which is a national scandal and disgrace.

Debtors and Creditors.

The object of nine-tenths of the civil law of every country is to make men pay their just debts. Actions and suits, judgments and executions, bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings, are different varieties of compulsion by which the law endeavours, often vainly enough, to enforce the performance of this obvious duty. The Lord Chancellor's Debtor and Creditor Bill is an attempt to remodel the process, with the view of improving the creditor's remedy, and of mitigating the severity to which debtors more unfortunate than culpable are occasionally subjected. There is a perfect chaos of opinion as to the principles on which such legislation should be founded; and we should have anticipated a more favourable result if the Chancellor had listened to the advice of Lord Campbell and Lord Overstone, who pressed him to refer his Bill to a Select Committee. It is not very difficult to point out defects in the existing law, and Lord Chelmsford's scheme has certainly hit some of the most obvious blots. But several of its most important points are indefensible on any principle, and will, we hope, not be suffered to become law without very material improvement. The three primary objects of every debtor and creditor code must be to compel the solvent debtor to pay, to ensure a fair and equal distribution of the property of those who cannot pay in full, and to punish all who have fraudulently incurred debts without the intention or without the means of paying them. Lord Chelmsford's bill introduces radical changes in the machinery for effecting each of these three ends.—There are but two ways in which payment of a debt can be enforced. One is by empowering the creditor under legal authority to help himself out of his debtor's property. The other is to put some pressure upon the debtor—call it punishment, torture, or what you will—and thereby to coerce him into producing any property he has, or to induce his friends to pay a ransom for his deliverance. The law as it stands, gives the creditor the option of resorting to either method. He may have his execution against lands or goods, or he may, if he prefers it, apply the requisite torture by incarcerating his enemy and awaiting the result. This last method was no doubt once very efficacious, except in the case of men who had neither money nor friends, or whose peculiar tastes made the interior of a debtor's prison a congenial place of abode. But modern humanity was shocked to see imprisonment for life inflicted as the penalty for having an empty purse; and the Insolvency Code was accordingly framed to enable any imprisoned debtor to recover his liberty on the terms of giving up all his property for the benefit of his creditors. Successive statutes have gone further in the same direction, and have enabled any insolvent debtor to escape a threatened imprisonment by making a similar disclosure of his property before falling into the hands of a creditor bent upon making him captive. Imprisonment for debt has thus become a mere preliminary process to force a debtor to come into the Insolvent Court and deliver up all that he may possess for distribution among his creditors. This is obviously a very clumsy contrivance. If a man can be brought into court without the previous imprisonment, for it is quite unnecessary to imprison him in the first instance. Twenty years ago, the recognised way of compelling a defendant to appear to an action against him was first of all to shut him up in prison. This barbarous practice has been abolished except in the one case where there is reason to believe that the debtor is about to abscond; and what Lord Chelmsford now proposes is to apply the same principle to the power of imprisonment after judgment which is used as a means of driving a man who cannot pay his debts into the Insolvent Court. Instead of locking him up, and waiting till he applies to the Court for relief, it is proposed that the creditor shall have the power to summon him there, and that preliminary incarceration shall only be permitted when the debtor is believed to contemplate flight. All the legitimate objects of imprisonment will then be obtained. The debtor will be examined by the Court as to his property, which will be seized for the benefit of his creditors, and imprisonment will be inflicted only in case he should refuse to make disclosure of his effects, or should be proved guilty of fraud. The principle of this important change in the law is to make the deprivation of liberty a punishment to be inflicted at the discretion of a Court, and to prohibit it as an instrument of torture to be used at the discretion of an individual creditor. The second novelty that the Bill contains is almost a necessary corollary from the abolition of imprisonment for debt. There was once a theory that all traitors who became bankrupt were to be considered, at any rate until the contrary was proved, as innocent victims of commercial misfortune. That if any one whose livelihood did not depend upon buying and selling happened unable to pay what he owed, it was assumed as not from a criminal cause that he was a peculiar subject of sympathy and consideration. Hence bankrupts were considered the favourable subjects of indulgent motives; and few persons who took credit for the revelations of the Bankruptcy Court during the last few years will think that there is much to choose between an average bankrupt trader and an ordinary specimen of an insolvent nondescript. There are some few in both classes who may justly attribute their losses to misfortune, but there is no such marked distinction in character between insolvencies of the trading and non-trading worlds as would justify entirely different treatment in the two classes of cases. At present, a bankrupt is simply deprived of all his property, and at the same time freed from all his debts; but an insolvent is not only compelled to divide all that he has, but is liable to be called on at any future time to give up every farthing he may afterwards acquire until his old creditors are paid in full. If this law were enforced, a whitewashed insolvent would be almost worse off than if he were consigned to prison, and the extreme severity of the law has in fact prevented the Court from applying it in ordinary cases. Lord Chelmsford's Bill does away with the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency, and makes the complete distribution of a debtor's property a satisfaction of bygone debts, without regard to the circumstances of his being or not being engaged in trade. To this, again, we think no reasonable objection can be urged.

The War Prospects in Europe.

A week ago, in commenting on the seemingly pacific aspect of affairs in Europe, we suggested the impropriety of placing any reliance on the appearances. The news brought by the mails during the past eight days confirms the justice of the suggestion, for we learn that at no period since the the present cloud began to impend over the continent, has the prospect of maintaining peace appeared so hopeless as at the date of the last advices from Paris and Vienna. Preliminary to batteries of artillery, the rival powers are in the meantime firing off broadsides of print at each other. The high value placed by the Emperor of France on publicity is evinced in apparently opposite courses adopted by him. He prohibits all news not agreeable to himself in the French journals, and he uses the Moniteur for the purpose of giving to the world his own "leading articles." The subject of his most recent remarks is the hostile language current in Germany. He reminds his neighbors that, if they have not forgotten the presence of French troops in their territories in the late war, they should recollect that they may have the opportunity of seeing in their streets French soldiers again. The tone is elaborately insulting,—intended probably to inspire fear, and operate as a warning to Prussia. The effect in the tenour of the time, will be, no doubt exactly the reverse.

The Austrian Government has been also seeking in the quarrel the advantage of publicity. A dispatch of Count Boul to Count Appony at the Court of St. James's has been published, and if intended to provoke hostilities, it could not have been better worded. The policy of Austria is to adhere strictly to treaties, not only to the European compact of 1815, but to the arrangements entered into with the minor states of Italy. Count Boul admits that a great power exercises a potent influence on small States, but claims credit for never assisting any Italian State without solicitation, and never continued assistance after being told that it could not be dispensed with. The Austrian and French armies did good service by protecting the Pope, and Austria is prepared to evacuate the legation when his Holiness is in a condition to enforce obedience. The vindication of Austrian policy is only one portion of the document. Count Buol does not hesitate to assail Piedmont, and his language respecting King Emmanuel and his Minister, Count Cavour, is of the most offensive and insulting kind. The animus is expressive of hatred inspired by fear; for the successor of Metternich is not ignorant of the fact that "now is the day and now is the hour" for Piedmont. Unequal to Austria in single combat, and assured of Austrian hostility if left alone, she is eager to profit by the occasion and, aided by the French, expel the Austrians from Lombardy. Lombardy annexed, Piedmont would be a respectable power, even though she handed over as a recompense Savoy to France. Victor Emmanuel can now precipitate a war, and unfortunately for the peace of Europe, it is his interest to do so. Louis Napoleon is nothing loath to join him in the work; and there may be for his Majesty a further incentive in the alarming state of the Two Sicilies. King Bomba a fil—dying or imbecile.

If Louis Napoleon has a Moniteur, Francis Joseph has a Gazette; and, while these two Majesties are preparing for combat, their literary and official organs are making war on each other. The Gazette in reply to the two articles in the Moniteur says: "The idea which inspired the article in the Moniteur is the divide et impera in the 'German question,' a question that would inevitably arise if a certain hand could give to the situation of Italy an equitable solution after the pattern of peace concluded at Paris in 1856." "Who does not," it proceeds, "still speak about the language used to the Austrian ambassador, at the Tuileries on the first day of this year? Who does not sum up the injuries inflicted on private and public wealth in every country? Does not the Moniteur confirm the existence of an alliance between France and Piedmont, an alliance long mentioned by rumour? 'The Emperor,' says the Moniteur, 'has promised the King of Sardinia to protect him against aggression from Austria.' Now, every one knows that a wide interpretation is given to the word 'aggression,' both at Paris and Turin. We have only to go back to the affair of Mentana, when the Moniteur applied the term 'aggression' to the defensive operations of the Ottoman troops who drove back the Garibaldians to their frontiers. Let us take up the first newspaper come to hand from Turin, inspired by the Government and the Parliament; there let us listen to the Piedmontese Parliament, and we shall fully understand what is meant by the 'aggression' which every day Count Appony, organ of the Imperial-Royal Austrian Legation at London, denounces to Europe." Did not the first Minister of Piedmont close the debate on the war with these words:—"The offensive and the defensive are relative notions?"

The Pope has contradicted the report of his having requested France and Austria to withdraw their troops, and his fears are implied in the fact that he has offered up prayers for the preservation of peace. The wishes of the Holy Father will have very little effect on the antagonistic powers, for they are apparently bent on the last appeal. Austria is pouring out troops into Lombardy, and raising and strengthening fortifications. France on the other hand, has sent transports for troops to Algeria, and ordered to southern railways to be in readiness to transport troops to Toulon and Marseilles. The quarrel between the royal cousins has been made up; and despite the alleged dislike of the Corps Legislatif, Prince Napoleon is to occupy in the Legislature the place now filled by his father.—Scottish American Journal.

White Partridges.

The Quebec Mercury says that white partridges have made their appearance in that region this winter. The Indians report them plenty at the Saguenay, where they never were seen before. Their bill differs in shape from that of the brown partridge, and they are also very thickly feathered down the talons like "bantams." Many years ago the first one then known was presented to Lord Aylmer. In 1844, also, they made their appearance, and now again are met with on all sides. The three lately killed were preserved as curiosities in the Museum of the Quebec Historical Society.

The Freight Depot at Preston Consumed by Fire.

We are informed that the Freight Warehouse on the Galt and Guelph branch of the Great Western Railway, at Preston, was entirely consumed on Monday last. The books belonging to the Customs department were all burnt, as also was a car partially loaded with goods. We are not aware whether there were much goods in the warehouse. The fire is said to have been the work of an incendiary.

An International Celebration.

The 25th of July, 1859, will be the centennial anniversary of the capture of Fort Niagara from the French by the joint forces of the British army and the American colonies. Hon. W. Hamilton Merritt, of St. Catherines, Canada, has publicly suggested that Brother Jonathan and Johnny Canucka unite in celebration of the event.—The suggestion, we notice, meets with approval among the press east, along the frontier. It is anticipated that much good will arise from a pleasant interchange of courtesies between Canadian's and Americans now so closely allied in trade. The celebration will be on a spot within the State of New York won from the French on the 25th July, 1759, by the united powers of British regulars and the colonial militia.

The New Canadian Coin.

The new Canadian silver coins—five, ten and twenty, cent pieces—have been examined by the assayers at the United States mint, and a report of their comparative value to our silver coin has been published.—The intrinsic value of a Canadian twenty cent piece, falls below that of two American dimes, nearly three-fourths of a cent.—And such pieces will sell at the Mint for bullion at 18½ cents. The same relative value attaches to the smaller coins. It is to be regretted that the British Mint did not fix the value of these coins at our standard, so that they could be readily circulated on both sides of the line, and there would be an end of all dispute about currency.

Weekly Line of Ocean Steamers.

From the 20th April next, Canada will have on the Atlantic, between Quebec and Montreal and Liverpool, a weekly line of steamers, till the end of October. One of the steamers of this line will leave Liverpool every Wednesday, during the summer months. In winter, the trips will be once a fortnight instead of once a week. The line will be composed of the following steamers:—

The Bohemian.....	Capt. McMaster.
The Hungarian.....	" Jones.
The Indian.....	" Bellantine.
The Nova Scotian.....	" Borland.
The North Briton.....	" Grange.
The Anglo-Saxon.....	" Powell
The North American..	" Aitcn.

Lake Ontario Steamers.

Mr Eaton, of Charlotte, informs the Rochester Union that he has advices from the President of the American Steamboat Company, Mr. Allen, of Ogdensburgh, that it is in contemplation to run a daily line along the south shore of the Lake and the St. Lawrence next season. Four of the best boats of the company will run between Lewiston and Ogdensburgh, calling at Toronto each way. The precise route of the boat is not stated, but it is thought they will run directly to Toronto and then across to Lewiston. This company last year ran a daily express line through the centre of the Lake and only one on the south shore—the Ontario—making semi-weekly trips between Ogdensburgh and Rochester.—The company contemplate a better system for business than the last, we presume, or they would not prepare to re-establish a daily shore line.

A man and horse were drowned on the 26th ult., in trying to cross the St. Lawrence.

The great Central tube of the Victoria Bridge, Grand Trunk Railway, was completed on March 31.

A bill for the incorporation of the Toronto and Nipissing Railway Company has been introduced into the Legislature by Mr. Gamble, of Durham. It provides for a line of railway from the Lake Simcoe, with a capital of $1,000,000, which may be increased to $2,000,000. The road is to be commenced within one year and completed to Lakeside within three years.

A tumult occurred, last week, in the Lunatic Asylum at Toronto, some of the patients rising upon their keepers, but they were overpowered and handcuffed.

Jacob Dewitt, one of our oldest merchants, President of the People's Bank and Member of Parliament for twenty-five years, died at Montreal, March 23, aged 76.

The Ottawa papers says a rumour prevails that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will lay the first stone of the new Parliamentary buildings.

The circulation of counterfeit bills appears to be becoming pretty general. On Friday night, a man named John Busby, attempted to pass two counterfeit $4's on the City Bank.

We are sorrow to observe that the Reformers of Ontario are about to loose the services of Mr. Brown, the editor of the Whitby Times. He is an able, consistent advocate of reform, and we wish him success wherever he goes.

Ships' Artillery and Fortifications.

ARMSTRONG AND WARRY.

Recent discussions in Parliament, and the contemporaneous proceedings of Governments, all tend to conclusions which have been for years sustained in these columns. Long antecedents to the Russian war, and while yet the country was apathetic on the subject, we endeavoured to awaken attention to the changes in the conditions of naval warfare, caused by the introduction of steam navigation. At that time our warnings were unheeded, and our opinions were not popular. In the sluggishness that results from a long peace, and in the confidence inspired by an uninterrupted series of victories at sea during the last great war, the English people lugged a belief that there shores were invulnerable. They held to the faith that "Britannia ruled the waves," and would by some providential law continue to hold the empire of the ocean through all time, as a natural consequence of her position. They regard the Channel as an impregnable barrier between them and the military Powers of Europe, and they never dreamed of the possibility of a breach being made in their "wooden walls." Following out these traditionary ideas, they allowed the army to be reduced to a number that did not suffice for the necessary reliefs to the regiments serving in India, and the colonies, they permitted the militia to fall into abeyance, and they utterly neglected coast defences. Even the navy sank into such a state of inefficiency, that when there was danger of a rapture with France on the Syrian question, some twenty years ago, our neighbours had actually a stronger force afloat than we had. Coincident with this neglect of military means, there was a rapid advance in commercial and industrial prosperity. Peace principles were in the ascendant, and large meetings cheered the orators who asserted that mankind had grown too wise for war. The vast armies of the continental monarchs were regarded with indifference, and the revolution and reaction of 1848 and 1849 did not disturb our profound conviction in the perpetual maintenance of peace. The great exhibition year, 1851, was hailed at the opening of a new era. It was taken that the representatives of all nations had assembled in Hyde-park, and had pledged their several countries to abandon all rivalry, except in arts, industry and commerce. At that very time Nicholas of Russia was preparing for his soring on Turkey, and before the lapse of three years we were engaged in a great war. It is not too much to say that when war broke out we were utterly unprepared. By draining the United Kingdom of troops we were barely able to send twenty thousand men to the Bosphorus, and make up the Baltic fleet we were compelled to leave our shores undefended. And yet we were in a far better state than we had been a few years previously. In 1846, when Sir Robert Peel was at the head of affairs, the Admiralty caught a glimmering of the necessity for creating a steam navy. At the same time something was done to place the army on a better footing, and four years later, under the influence of an invasion panic, the militia was revived. The progress made up to the commencement of the Russian war was but slow. In the six years between 1847 and 1854 there were only forty-two steamships added to the fleet, by building and conversion, and of these only nine were ships of the line, including blockships, pronounced by Sir J. Pakington to be utterly worthless. The great majority were frigates and corvettes, with eight steamships and tenders. Since 1854 there has been much greater activity but, as we recently had occasion to show, we have not kept pace with other maritime Powers. At the present time, after years of promises, and when the affairs of Europe wear a threatening aspect, we are patently without a good Channel fleet. In other moments for defence, however, we are further advanced. The army is more generous, better clothed, better armed, and better in its organization, and in the militia we have a valuable reserve. Our coast fortifications also have been materially increased and with a little time for preparation we should be ready to encounter any enemy that might appear on land or sea.

Parliament and the Government appear to be fully alive to the necessities of the time. They recognize the fact, which it would be in the last degree perilous to ignore, that steam has, in a great measure, bridged the channel, and that every year lends to contravention England, if she may seek the aggression. We are seeking power to the condition of continental Powers, and we must arrange our means of defence accordingly. There are a navy, an army, and fortifications. Shall we deem the militia, and the steamship and fortifications of the guardians. As to the mode in which the latter may be best made available, we do not at present feel competent to offer an opinion. The attention is earnestly directed to that want, we may hope that it will be supplied. It is plain that it would be impossible to fortify the whole coast of England. Of course, the great naval arsenals and the mouth of the Thames must be protected by fortifications as strong as can be constructed by engineering science. Further than that we cannot go, except, perhaps, by providing moveable batteries, which would, to a certain extent, be effectual in checking an enemy. But the fleet might be evaded and an invading force might be thrown upon some unprotected part of the coast.—It might be possible, as calculated by continental strategists, for two or more of the maritime Powers to combine, and to engage our naval squadrons while their steam-transports ran in and landed troops. Such a contingency is not very probable, but we must not discard any possibility. Should an enemy land, we must look to our army and militia to repel and to chastise him.—The estimates for the ensuing financial year are framed to maintain an effective force of one hundered and five thousand men of all arms, including twenty-three thousand of embodied militia, but exclusive of marines, pensioners, and the depots of regiments belonging to the army in India.—The number does not bring our military establishment to anything like an equality with those of foreign nations, and neither is it intended to do so. But it appears to us to be sufficient to meet any force that could be suddenly landed on our shore.—It is to be remembered that soldiers are not required in England as in other countries to "maintain order" in a discontented population in the event of invasion, the whole people could be at its back. So far as the army is concerned we may be well satisfied with the measures of the Government.

We have often stated the reasons why it is not possible or desirable that we should have great fortresses or a large standing army. On another point, however, we ought to be superior to all other nations.—With our enormous power of construction, our vast resources, and our pre-eminent mechanical skill, we ought to surpass the world in scientific means of defence. It is undoubtedly true that "the best of ships and the best of cannon ought to be ours at all moments, and under all circumstances." We must have the ships to preserve the inviolability of our shores; and we must have the cannon for our ships, our forts, and our field batteries. The fate of battles will in future rest, in all probability, on the relative strength of artillery in the contending forces. If ever we shall have to meet an invading army, we shall rely upon our artillery for mowing down its ranks. Therefore it is that so much interest is felt in the reports of the marvellous power of Armstrong's gun. General Peel, in his statement to the House of Commons, has more than confirmed all that we have heard.—In portability, extent of range, precision, and destructive effect, this gun is as superior to modern ordnance as the latter is to the hooped cannon of our ancestors. The weapon invented by Sir W. Armstrong is a breech-loading, rifled, wrought iron gun, made to throw either solid shot or shell or common case. It weighs no more than one-third of an ordinary gun of the same calibre, and it is superior in strength. From its comparative lightness it may be worked by a small number of men, and it is equally available for ships as for fortifications or field artillery. It is impossible to exaggerate the advantages, both on land and sea, of the portability and manageability of this gun. The extent of its range would be incredible it we did not learn it on unimpeachable testimony. It appears that the range of a thirty-two-pound gun, charged with five pounds of powder, in a little more than five miles and a quarter. This more than realises the dream of Captain Warner, and the precision of the gun is still more extraordinary. At three thousand yards, or nearly two miles, the accuracy of the Armstrong gun is as seven to one when compared with the common gun at one thousand yards, while at one thousand yards it will hit an object fifty-seven times which the best gun now in use would only hit once. Therefore, at equal distances the Armstrong gun is fifty-seven times as accurate as our common artillery, or, in other words, the power of artillery is increased more than fifty-fold by this invention. Its destructive effect also exceeds anything that has been hitherto witnessed. A shot from Armstrong's gun at eight hundred yards goes through a solid mass of oak bolted together to the thickness of nine feet. In the trials against the iron-cased floating batteries, with a range of four hundred yards, the steel-pointed bullets fired from a thirty-two-pound Armstrong gun crushed in five-inch metal plates, passed through the vessel, and tore up decks and beams of the strongest construction. The full power of the weapon has not been tested, and it is impossible to predict the result of its general introduction into our army. It has been put in a general form, that a thousand gunners would be able to work more than twice as many guns as formerly, and each of these pieces would be equivalent in its effects to fifty pieces of the old model. Even this statement falls short of the mark, and there must be no doubt, that Sir W. Armstrong's invention will work a revolution in warfare.

Before we have ceased to marvel at the wonderful results produced, by the Armstrong gun, another inventor appears in the field with a element apparently offering greater advantages to its possessor. This gun, invented by Mr. Warry, of the Royal Engineers, is also a breech-loader and rifled, and the rapidity of firing it is unparalleled. By a simple contrivance, a single movement puts the cartridge, primes the charge, closes the breech, and fires the gun. Mr. Warry can easily vouch a dozen, or twelve hundred pounds of bullets, as fast as they can be supplied to engage a vessel, and to pass and repass above her deck, as long as ammunition lasts. Mr. Warry, and without dismounting his gun, can fire with equal facility from either broadside. It is said he has proved that his gun can discharge more than twice as many rounds in a given time as any other gun, and that the projectiles are thrown with greater force and precision. Mr. Warry's invention can be applied at a small cost to all our existing ordnance, and in this there would be a great gain both of time and money. Sir W. Armstrong's gun is made of wrought iron and steel, and is consequently very expensive. With all the means at his command it will be many years before he can replace all the guns required in the British service. If, as reported, the existing guns can be rifled and fitted with Mr. Warry's invention, a vast saving may be effected in time and money. We are of opinion that both inventions should be made available. Sir W. Armstrong's guns must be the best because of their portability and long range. Mr. Warry's invention can be more quickly brought into general use. In the end, it may be found that Warry's gun is fitted for fixed fortifications, and the Armstrong gun for moveable batteries.

It would be useless to speculate on the ultimate consequences of these ingenious inventions in the art of destruction. The immediate result will probably be, a saving of life, as a general, with powerful artillery, can spare his men. The greater the range of the guns the less is the necessity for exposing the soldiers. As to the effect on fortifications of these new discoveries, no one can yet speak with certainty, but it is satisfactory to know that a committee of experienced officers has already been appointed to inquire into the whole subject.

The Arrival of Italian Refugees in Cork.

INTERESTING PARTICULARS.

We recently announced the arrival in Queenstown, on Sunday, March 6, of the American ship David Stewart, having on board Poerio and his companions, whom the Neapolitan Government had set free from the dungeons of that State. It will be remembered that, though pardoned, they were sentenced to banishment, and that after having been deported from their native country to Spain, it was afterwards determined that they should be sent to America. Accordingly the David Stewart was chartered to take them from Cadiz to New York, where, upon landing each was to receive the sum of $120, and be released from all further control. They had been brought from Naples to Cadiz in a Neapolitan transport, from which, after about twree weeks, they were put on board the David Stewart. From the Cork Examiner we copy the following particulars:

"All the party having been put on board at Cadiz, the David Stewart was towed out to sea for a distance of nearly 200 miles by a Neapolitan war steamer. The steamer then cast off, and left the ship with a fair wind from the east. Scarcely, however, was the ship well away from the protection of the steamer's guns, than the exiles, in a body, came to the Captain, delivered to him a protest against being carried to New York and called upon him to make for the first port he could reach in England. The captain, one third of whose freight had been retained as a guarantee for the performance of his contract, remonstrated with their demand to have him break his engagement, and ultimately refused. They appeared to acquiesce to his decision, or, at least, pressed no more that evening; but the next morning it was again renewed, and in a more decided manner. A young Italian, named Raffaelli Settembrini, had shipped with the captain in Cadiz, and signed articles as a seaman. Up to that morning he had done his work with the rest of the crew. But when the assemblage waited upon the captain, he made his appearance in the uniform of a mate of the Galway line of steamers—a handsome blue cloth, with gilt buttons, gold cap-band, &c. This position he really had held; but it turned out he was the son of Luigi Settembrini, who, hearing of his father's conditional pardon, and of his destination, left for Spain and resorted to the ruse we have mentioned to join him. The captain of the ship believes that he was despatched by the Italian Society of London to aid the prisoners in the course they subsequently took. The exiles stated that they had a navigator in their party, and that even if they had to take the ship out of the hands of the Captain and crew, they would be able to sail her without their assistance. They represented to the Captain that they had been two months at sea, many of them being old, and all with constitutions more or less enfeebled by an imprisonment of ten years, so that a long voyage would be torture to them all, and death perhaps to some. They contended also that, being under the American flag, they were free, and that they had no right to be taken anywhere but where they choose. These arguments, backed up by the preponderance of physical force, the exiles being sixty-six, while the crew was but seventeen, and the determination of the former to resort to extremities to carry out their intention compelled the Captain to yield and turn the vessel's head northward. They were temperate and polite in manner, but about their determination there could be no mistake. They set a guard, of theirs or yours in turn, to keep watch over the compass, and see that the ship's head was kept in the direction of the haven they looked for. The weather was baffling and the passage was tedious. The Captain intended making for Dijle, but missed the harbor in a fog, and had got as far as Ballycotton, but being foiled in with a Cork pilot, went back again; at last at length after a voyage of 16 days, the ship anchored in the great of our coast. As fast as possible, the whole band got themselves equipped ashore in Queenstown, and for a time led in the most freely manner their [illegible] of freedom. The [illegible] of cause went to catch a fresh [illegible] they actually filled the rail space with [illegible] they had started first at Gibraltar. [illegible] state that their ship [illegible] the length of the ship believes that he was [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illeg he is somewhat older. He now speaks but a few words in English, though it is said he at one time knew the language well. The want of exercise in speaking or reading it during the period of his long imprisonment has almost entirely obliterated it from his memory. The young nobleman to whom we have already alluded is not of very prepossessing appearance. We have not learned the ultimate intention of this band of exiles but it is very probable the great majority of them will go back to Italy, seeking refuge in the Sardinian kingdom. Under any circumstances, Feenie will, we believe, go to Sardinia."

How Canada is Governed.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

Since 1841 the forms of Constitutional Government in Canada have not been openly disregarded, if we except a period of some months during the Administration of Sir Charles. Afterward Lord Metcalfe, during the latter part of 1843 and the first eight months of 1844. At that time, for a period of nine months, the Governor General took upon himself the administration of the Government, by the aid of a single Minister, a Secretary of State. The conduct of the Governor General, so far from meeting the disapproval of the Home Government, to whom he owed his appointment and by whom he was liable to be recalled, was rewarded with a peerage. So far back as 1791, the appearance of the constitutional system was granted to the Canadians; the Canadas being divided into two Provinces, and a Representative Assembly accorded to each. The benefits of the representative system were, however, neutralized by the creation of a Second Chamber, the members of which owed their nomination to the Crown. The result was the growth of an oligarcy in both Provinces, the executive officers of the Government using the machinery of the Second Chamber to check the democratic aspirations of the representatives of the people. In this way the latter who, for years together, were in direct and constant opposition to the Executive Government, were reduced to a shadow and a name. This abnormal state of things, so utterly opposed to the British practice of holding the Ministry responsible to the Legislature, begat an opposition, which only ended in the catastrophe of 1837-8.

Now all this is changed. Since 1841 the Provincial Administration has been required to command a majority of the Legislative Assembly; and with the exception already noted, the forms of constitutional government have not been openly violated. The Governor General no doubt possesses almost omnipotent power in the choice of Ministers, and can do much to assist any party in whose favour his influence may be cast in periods of political crisis. To a great extent the machinery of the Government is moved by external influences. In Lombard street the Canadas are looked upon as a field for the exploitation of the capitalists and usurers of the mother country. No direct revenue can be raised from them, it is true, but their Government may, to a very great extent, be carried on for the benefit of English money-brokers and stock-jobbers. The influence of the latter is very great in England, where the moneyed aristocracy unites with the landed aristocracy to control the Government. Mr. Hincks, who was first Minister in Canada, from 1851 to 1854, we have it on unquestionable authority, owed his appointment as Governor of the Windward Islands, in 1858 to the influence exerted in his favour in Downing street, by the Barings, the financial agents of the Province, who, doubtless, had their own reasons for this act of practical gratitude. Another financial Minister Mr. Cayley, was rejected by his old constituents, in one of the westernmost counties of the Province, in the Winter of 1857; but orders coming out from Lombard street from the House of Baring Brothers, that he must be retained in the Government, another constituency had to be found for him. Shunned in the west, he found a refuge in the extreme east of Upper Canada, where a pliable and obliging member of the Legislative Assembly was induced to resign in his favor. If any financial emissary was to be sent from England to the Canadas—if there is any "channeling," as our Canadians term it to be done—he goes straightway to the Government House and lays his plans before Sir Edmund Head, or whoever may be the occupant of the gubernatorial office for the time being. Thus did the last representative from England of the Grand Trunk Railway interests; and, in the quietest way possible, he succeeded in obtaining the deferring of the Government loan, which was then the first mortgage for some $16,000,000 upon the road, till after all other parties interested, stockholders and bondholders, shall get six per cent on their investment.

But the greatest stroke of financial policy which has yet been attempted in British America is now in the act of being effected. The Federation of all the five British American Provinces, our readers are aware has been proposed. Such a scheme, one would naturally suppose, originated in considerations arising out of the future welfare of the five Provinces. Nobody would suspect that project originated in a desire to give value to certain railway stock; that it was neither more nor less than a stock-jobbing operation; that the future of British America was to be made plaything of the holders of Grand Trunk Railway stock and bonds! Yet that such is the case we have the authority of a gentleman in London, who is fully cognizant of the secret springs of the movement, for saying so. The case is this: The eastern section of the Grand Trunk Railway—all below Richmond, opposite Montreal—is unprofitable; and, as things stand at present, must forever remain so. The portion of this section which lies between Quebec and St. Thomas hardly earns sufficient to purchase oil to lubricate the engines. Sometimes it is open and sometimes closed. To make the matter worse this profitless section is being extended as far as Trois Pistoles; and when it is completed, the keeping of the road open between that point and Richmond will impose a burden upon the paying sections of the line which must render the whole stock unprofitable, and leave but a slender chance for the bondholders. It would be a master stroke of the policy to get rid of this section of the line. But how is it to be done? By constructing an inter-colonial railroad, connecting Canada, New-Brunswick and Nova-Scotia. In that case, the burdensome section of the Grand Trunk, below Richmond, won't serve for a link in the inter-colonial line; and there would then be a chance of the present proprietors getting rid of it. But an inter-colonial railroad is not required to connect Provinces whose northernmost do not approach within hundreds of miles of one another, and between which there are scarcely any trade connections. A project for the construction of an inter-colonial railroad must therefore, be found ground which to prop up for that purpose, save the Grand Trunk? Why, in the secret history of this project, connected with the Federation of the British American Provinces, such a railroad was declared to be necessary. Why? Because the Grand Trunk Railway could not be sold without it. Why? Because the Grand Trunk Railway could not be sold without it. Why? Because the Grand Trunk Railway could not be sold without it our camp, while its progress was checked, and it moved not more than a quarter of a mile an hour. But it formed a grand sight. There was a stream of lava running over the plain, twenty to twenty-five feet in height, and an eighth of a mile in width, though its depth varied a great deal. It was a mass or pile of red-hot stones, roaring along a mile of coals on fire, borne along by the liquid lava underneath. As it moved slowly along, large red boulders would roll down the sides, breaking into a thousand small stones, crushing and burning the trees which lay in the track. It is impossible to give a true conception of the immense force and power of this lava stream, bearing along as it does an almost inconceivable mass. It reminds us most vividly of the breaking up of the ice in a large river, only the imagination must stretch the comparison and suppositions are piled up twenty-five feet, and thus borne along by the current beneath, the whole width of the river moving at the same time crashing and breaking, and piling up some and irregular masses on top. But even this comparison is far below the reality—to be conceived it must be seen.

A correspondent writing from Waimea Hawaii, Feb. 4, says:

The burning crater seems to be constantly enlarging, and throwing up its volcanoes of liquid fire above the mouth of the crater—I will not venture to say how high—and the fiery streams rolled onward and onward, still adding grandeur and terror as it proceeded, till, on the morning of the 31st about sunrise, the stream was compelled, though reluctantly, to stop, by meeting the waters of the ocean. Even then its resistless and opposing energy carried it some distance into the sea.

The poor inhabitant of Wainanalii, the name of the village where the fire reached the ocean, were aroused at the midnight hour by the hissing and roaring of the approaching fire, and had but just time to save themselves. Some of the houses of the inland portion of the villages were partly surrounded before the inmates were aware of their danger. Wainanalii is near the northern boundary of North Kona and about twelve or fourteen miles from Kawaihae. It is, of course all destroyed, and its pleasant little harbour all filled up with lava. The whole distance of the flow from the crater to the sea is some forty miles.

Last night (February 3) the volcano was in full blast, and the burning stream seems to have taken another direction. Parties have gone out to-day to see and explore. Perhaps, on their return, I shall have something additional to communicate.

The War Symptoms.

From the European Times.

The war symptoms are like the changes of the kaleidoscope—they vary with every turn, daily and even hourly. Yesterday the feeling in Paris was one of great depression, and all hopes of peace appear, in certain quarters, to have been given up. This is the more to be regretted, because it was known that Lord Cowley had had an interview on Thursday, at the Tuileries, with the Emperor in presence of count Walewski, and, although what actually occured has not transpired, it is tolerably clear, from the general opinion that war was inevitable, that the interview was not reassuring. It is said that Austria, goaded by the menaces of France and Piedmont, is rather anxious for war than otherwise, and the defiant articles of the journals of Vienna give a well grounded assurance to this statement. We learn by a letter from that capital, written as recently as Tuesday last, that even there the impression was general that peace could not be maintained. Military preparations both in France and Austria are going on at a speed that indicates that the struggle is not remote, and a piece of news comes from Turin of a remarkable kind, to the effect that a secret convention was concluded between Victor Emmanuel and Louis Napoleon before the Princess Clotilde was married to Prince Napoleon, by which treaty France promises offensive and defensive succour to Sardinia, and undertakes that Lombardy shall be annexed to Piedmont, on condition that Savoy and Nice should be ceded to France. The belief of a secret convention between the contracting parties having been executed, was stated before, but the terms were never put forth circumstantially until now, and the course of events on the Seine, as well as on the Danube seems to justify their probability. The recent statement of Le Nord is corroborative of this view, for the Belgian journal declares that M. Cavour has recently sent to Paris a long memoir, in which all the aggressive acts of Austria towards Piedmont are elaborately set forth.

"The German manifestations are conflicting," to use the article in the Moniteur. The Bavarian Chambers have voted a large credit for military preparations, and the Wurtemburg Government, which was generally believed to be more favourable to France than most of the German states. It is known that the Prussian Envoy at Paris has had interviews with the Emperor in connection with the affairs of the North. In the minor states, and the Hanoverian representative has left on a mission with Count Walewski, taking with the latter name. In fact the whole of the German diplomatists in the minor metropolis have been concentrating round the centre, in Germany. But one of the strongest proofs of the impending struggle is the fact that Prussia has called for Turkish troops to assist in the Lower Rhine. Mr. Bulwer, the British Envoy, has had an interview with the Sultan, and it is said that the Porte has consented to the request of Prussia. The Turkish troops will be commanded by a German officer, and will be employed in Germany, not in Italy. Prussia has refused the Magyar, the country should arise, to Genoa,—a city within Turin, not open to the inroads of the enemy.

It is clear that Lord Malmesbury and Mr. Disraeli must try their hands again, and we trust more successfully, in proving to the British Parliament that the peace of Europe will not be broken. They have evidently been duped, or they exceeded truth in the first statement—which, we shall probably know in a short time.

Mexico.

The very genius of desolation, of anarchy, of bloody feuds and internecine struggles, of confiscation, intrigue, robbery, plunder, poverty and despair, seems at last to have assumed complete mastery of Mexico. The condition of no people in the world, it seems to us, can be more wretched than is at this moment there realised; and sending an eye along the horizon of the future, we can see no signs of that breaking away of the terrible clouds that distil blight, blood, poison, and swarms of unclean reptiles.

What unknown and horrible influence is that which thus broods, an ever present evil over the country, and nerves the arms and hearts of brothers to delight in each other's blood, to trample beneath their cruel and unnatural feet the children of a common mother? Is it the slow finger of Providence that, from year to year, from decade to decade, moves over the hills and plains, clothed in perpetual verdure and flowers, the avenger of Guatimozin's tortures, the searchers for gold? Does the past thus re-appear in its mysterious connections with the present, to show that crimes which shock mankind, the cries which pierce the heavens, shall not go unremembered, unredressed? We do not know, and cannot tell; but it really appears to us that in Mexico the most extraordinary and unatural national phenomena of modern times are presented to us. In what other country have revolution, carnage, and all horrors of anarchy followed each other so rapidly, so persistently, embracing so extensive an area, and which are still kept up with such desperation of madness, such fury of utter blindness? In what other country has so much fratricidal blood been shed within the last quarter of a century?

We have become so accustomed to hear of the scenes enacted in Mexico that we fail to appreciate their nature. Suppose six thousand men were about to start, say from Nashville to attack Charleston, that the latter place were defended by an equal number; that another army of the same size were to come upon Nashville from North Carolina, and at the same time that Pennsylvania and Virginia were the scenes of the meeting of hostile parties in battle array; suppose law utterly powerless, half the cities of the Union liable to sudden attack at any moment by armed banditti, the Presidential office changing hands two or three times in as many weeks, and we should have a faint idea of what is actually witnessed in Mexico at the present writing, and what has been going on there in substance for years.

While this is a most mournful state of things to contemplate, Mexico affords to the people of the United States a lesson whose livid and gory characters ought to make an impression upon the minds of the former that no time or circumstance should be able to efface. Perhaps for this very purpose has Providence permitted Mexico to become what she is, and to exhibit to us the tableaux that she presents.—New Orleans Bulletin.

Lecture on the Maine Law.

Mr. Sinclair delivered a lecture on the working of the "Prohibitory Liquor Law, in the State of Maine," in the Temperance Hall, Toronto, on Thursday evening last, to a large and respectable audience, every seat being occupied, and many obliged to stand. Hon. Mr. Spence, presided, and opened the proceeding by referring to the great increase in the number of saloons in Toronto since 1852. In that year, he said, there were 100 places where liquor was sold, and the population being at that time 33,000, this gave one licensed saloon to every 166 of the inhabitants. In 1858, the population had increased to 55,000, and the saloons to 460 in number, making one to every 119 persons. He was, however, gratified to think that such a state of things would not long continue, as the report of the Committee to whom was referred the petitions relative to a Prohibitory Liquor Law, would soon come up for discussion, and he felt certain that if a Bill were introduced into Parliament to prevent the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors, it would soon become law. He would not further refer to the matter, but would leave his more able friend, Mr. Sinclair, to speak in reference to the workings of the "Maine Liquor Law." The lecturer, who on rising was greeted with a round of applause, which lasted some time, said he was happy to see such a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen. It was an assurance to him and to all connected with the temperance movement that they took great interest in a subject which was certainly of great importance to Toronto, and Canada generally—the passing of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. He had visited Maine for the purpose of seeing with his own eyes how the law which had now became world-known as the "Maine Law," was carried out. He entered Portland on the 6th December last, and resided for ten days in that city with Hon. Neal Dow—the warmest advocate of the temperance cause on the continent of America. (Applause.) He might inform the audience that in 1856, the law had been repealed on a new political party getting into power, and a stringent liquor law enacted. Shortly after this latter law was passed, it was found that there were upwards of 500 liquor dealers in the city of Portland alone. A change again took place, as another party held the reins of power, and two issues were placed before the people; whether he would continue the license law then in force, but which was to a great extent a dead letter, or return to the Prohibitory system. A vote was taken, when it was found that 5,912 persons were in favor of the former, and that 23,834 individuals had recorded their votes for the latter measure. (Applause.) The Prohibitory Law came into force on the 15th July, 1858, and he was glad to inform them that the day before it went into operation, the one-half of the 500 liquor-dealers whom he had alluded to, shut up their premises, while the remainder had been compelled to give up the sale of liquor after having been fined, and many of them imprisoned. While in Portland, he received an English paper containing a letter signed by a clergyman of New York, which stated that the Maine Law had been a failure in Portland, and the question was submitted by the writer—"If they can't shut up the saloons of Portland, how do they expect to close them up in such cities as Boston and New York?" He (Mr. Sinclair) showed the letter to Mr. Dow and asked him to furnish the statements it contained. Mr. Dow replied that they were entirely without foundation. This, however, did not suit him (Mr. Sinclair) for he found that the statements in the letter were circulated by a correspondent of the Montreal Witness, who visited the Magor, the City Marshal, and the Mayor who had held office during the two years the stringent Licence Law was in force which permitted only five men to sell liquor in the city. Mayor Wells, who had been in office from 1856 to 1858, informed him that instead of 5 there was over 500 places in which liquor was sold — that it was impossible to carry out the law, and that he had always said nothing would do but the enactment of the Maine law, for they could not secure a conviction under the one which was in force from 1856 to 1858. The City Marshal informed him (Mr. Sinclair) that in November, 1857, ninety persons were committed to prison on a charge of drunkenness, and in November, 1858, five months after the Maine law came into effect, only 42 were incarcerated; showing a diminution of 55 in this short space of time. (Applause.) In the Alms' House, a great reduction also took place in the number of inmates admitted. The number in 1857 was 174, while in 1858 they only amounted to 110. Those who received out-door relief were reduced one-half. Mr. Sinclair then enumerated the other benefits which had resulted from the passing of the law. These facts he had sent to England, to counteract the statement of the clergymen he had referred to, and also the remark of the Marshal, that not a drop of liquor was sold openly in Portland. (Applause.) He (Mr. Sinclair) was in the habit of transmitting facts and documents to the old country in reference to the progress of temperance, and a few days ago he had forwarded a copy of the Globe to Scotland, containing the announcement that a Bill, having for its purpose the enactment of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, was about to be introduced into the House of Assembly. (Great applause) The lecturer concluded by calling on all those in the hall who were not teetotallers, to come forward and sign the pledge. Upwards of 140 persons responded to the call. Mr. Sinclair lectured in the same place on Friday evening.

Three Murderers Executed at New Orleans.

From the New Orleans Picayune, 18th March.

This morning Heinrich Haas, Joseph Lindsay, and Peter Smith, all convicted of murder, suffered the penalty of death by hanging. At an early hour a large crowd besieged the gates of the prison, eagerly seeking to obtain a sight of the terrible spectacle. This morbid craving however, was not satisfied, and none could obtain admittance. Shortly after ten o'cock, the three condemned men appeared, escorted by the Rev. Father Dufau and his assistant, and officers of the prison. They were dressed in white, in their shirts and pants, the head covered with a white nightcap, and their hands tied behind their backs; each wore a crucifix suspended to a black ribbon around his neck. Their countenances were calm, even smiling. They took their seats on the fatal bench, and the hangman, a negro disguised with a loose black domino and a mask, fixed the rope around their necks and disappeared in the cell behind.

Lindsay, who is quite a young man, first spoke, and addressed the crowd with a clear and wringing voice. He acknowledged his crime, and said the penalty was but just; he had sinned against the laws of his country and the laws of his God, and he must die; but he blessed that death, for he was reconciled with his God; he begged the crowd to forgive him also; he thanked Captain Fremaux, Mr. Revril, and the inner keepers of the prison, for their kindness to him; he bid everyone good bye and hoped his example would not be lost. Peter Smith spoke next, in nearly the same terms, but struggling with his emotion. Heinrich Haas, the oldest man of the three, was the last to speak. His features were lit, as in a clear voice he addressed the attentive crowd. He said that drink was not the only incentive to crime, that every sinful appetite indulged in brought men by degrees to the worst crimes, and finally to the gallows. His ruin was caused by the sin of impurity; he warned all men to restrain and subdue their passions and not to deface the image of God. He was going to die of an awful death, and yet that death was not one thousand part what he deserved. He was a great sinner, but as great as were his crimes, the goodness and mercy of his Saviour had pardoned him. He died with joy, he was happy, and preferred that death to life on this earth. He spoke long and feelingly, and, after bidding farewell to the people, began chanting a hymn with much power. While he spoke and sung, his two companions seemed to find new courage in his enthusiastic words, and preserved a perfect composure.

The Rev. Father Dufau spoke a few parting words to each, and presented them the crucifix, which they kissed repeatedly. Young Lindsay burst out into an act of contrition, repeated by the two others, and was kissed on the cheek by Father Dufau, who recited aloud an exhortation and gave his blessing to the three doomed men.

Lindsay and Smith died instantly, having had their necks broken, and a slight quiver of the frame was all that denoted the passage from life to death; but poor Haas suffered longer—the noose had not been made tight enough, and strangulation took place slowly. His legs moved convulsively his whole frame shook, and the blood rushing into his face soon blackened it and trickled out of his ears.

The Washington Tragedy!

TRIAL OF DANIEL E. SICKLES FOR THE MURDER OF PHILIP B. KEY.

Washington, April 9.

The case for the defence opened this morning. It is expected that Mr. Graham will consume the whole day in the opening address. His associates would prefer brevity on the opening. They wish to reserve their plans of operation for the present, to say nothing of Mr. Key, except that immediately connected with the transaction, to withhold comments on the prosecution. There has been no attempt to account for the disparity between the size of the bullet extracted from the body of Mr. Key, and the bore of the Derringer found in the street. The defence deny that the Derringer belonged to Mr. Sickles. No effort has been made to trace it to him, and the defence will make the best of this circumstance and claim that it belonged to Mr. Key, that the first shot came from Mr. Key. As to the two keys found in the pocket of the deceased, the idea is that they were those of the house in Fifteenth-street, where the meeting took place; and, if so, the circumstance will be put in evidence. Two letters from Mr. Key to Mr. Sickles, one in feigningly denouncing the insinuation made with respect to Mr. Sickles and the other accepting a subsequent invitation to dinner, will be offered in evidence. If not admitted, Council will make one of them before the jury. The grounds for admission become greater in the case presented. Many are present from New York; among them John Kelly, himself. John Cochrane, M. C., John Cheney, County Clerk, Colvin Hastings and Comptroller Flagg. Mr. Pugsley has returned to New York. The Court opened at 10.15. After some delay the prisoner was conducted into Court and placed in the dock, where he conferred with Mr. Brady, Mr. Stanton and Beverly Johnson. The jurors were called, and answered to their names. Mr. Graham proceeded to address the jury, amid the solemn silence and attention of the whole court. He said, "May it please the Court and gentlemen of the Jury, this is to me the time of solemn thoughts, and I arise to address you laboring under a severe struggling of feeling. It is a beautiful sentiment, better expressed in the Latin than in the translation—'Prosperity is the parent of friends, and bad fortune is the fire in which they are tried.' Friendship is the most sacred of all artificial, as distinguished from our natural attachments. It stands nearest to those who, by the hand of nature, have been interwoven with the objects which she creates. On the altar of that relation I cast my present offering. It carries with it the unction of a warm heart; may it prove to be an efficacious tribute in favour of my client. I have been the companion of his sunshine, and now call here to participate in the gloom of his present afflictions. Trouble is a mysterious visitor. It seems to be the unshunable doom of man. It has been well said that "although affliction cometh not forth from the dust, neither does trouble spring out of the ground. Man is born into trouble as the sparks fly upward.' That same great influence which has impressed the laws on all departments of creation—which has studded the heavens with their fires, and ordained the boundary line between day and night. That same great influence which stretches over the face of nature, verdures earth's green mantle and again supplants it for the less pleasing dress of winter. That same great influence which has designed the time for the dropping of the leaves and the falling of the sparrow in the will which guides and the hand which holds the rod with which, in this life, we are punished as we pass from the proceeding in which we are here engaged.—May we be permitted to repeat over the result in which I confidently anticipate, as one congratulatory to this defendant for the severe ordeal through which he has passed. 'Behold! happy is the man whom God correcteth, therefore despise not then the chastening of the Almighty. He maketh sorrow and He bindeth up. He woundeth and his hand maketh whole. 'He shall deliver thee in six troubles. Yea, in seven, there shall no evil touch thee.' A few days since the body of a human being was found in the throes of death in one of the streets of your city. It proved to be the body of a confirmed and habitual adulterer. On a day too sacred to be profaned, by worldly toil on which he was forbidden to moisten his brow with the sweat of honest labor.—On a day when he should have risen above the grossness of his nature, and though on no other day he had sent aspirations heavenward, he should on that day have allowed to pass in that direction, we find him besieging, with the most evil intentions that castle where for their security and repose the law had placed the wife and children of his neighbor. If he had observed the solemn precept, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,' he might at that moment had formed one of the living. The injured father and husband rushes on him in the moment of his guilt, and under the influence of frenzy, executes on him a judgment which was as just as it was summary. The issue which you are here to decide is whether this act renders its author amendable to the laws of the land. In the decision of that issue, gentlemen of the Jury, you have a deep and solemn interest. You are here to fix the price of the marriage bed. You are here to say in what estimation that sacred couch is held by an honest and intelligent American Jury. You are favored citizens, and live in a city which constitutes the seat of our Federal Government, a city bearing the name of the illustrious Washington, the father of his country, of whom it has been emphatically and truly said, that he was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

How they Marry in America.

One of our Justices of the peace was called the other afternoon to go to a German house in the city and marry a couple.—Putting on a clean collar and putting a marriage certificate in his pocket, he started for the festive scene. Arrived at the house under the direction of a blue-legged little boy, who had pointed out the place, he knocked and went in. In the middle of the floor stood a stout German girl, merry and plump, her blue eyes rolling out tears as large as butter pats. "Whats the matter?" said the sympathetic Justice.—"Matter," said the girl, "dat Gotlieb went off, and wouldn't marry me, ain't it?" The Justice said he supposed it was, and intimated that he had come to marry some one; and requested the old lady to bring on the lambs to the sacrifice. The old lady said, "Dare vos no lambs—Gotlieb ish run off, and will not marry my Katarina."—"Well," said the Justice. "Gotlieb is not the only man there is; send for some other man to marry her." At this Katarina's face brightened up, and she ejaculated, "Yah—dat is good—send mit Hans."—Hans was sent for, but couldn't come.—When her messenger returned, Katerina, determined not to give it up, said, "Send mit Skoseph." Shoseph was sent for, but couldn't be found. Katarina's heart fell at this news; and the Justice was growing impatient. Just then Katerina looked out of the window, and saw a short and thick young German going by, when she rushed to the door and hallooed, "Fritz—Fritz!"—Fritz shortly made his appearance at the door, when Katarina's mother said, "Fritz you lofs mine Katarina!" Fritz allowed he did, more as sour-kraut. "Then stand up here," thundered the Justice; and before Fritz could realise his position, he was a man and wife, and Katarina's arms were around his neck, and her lips pressed to his, she crying between the calisthenics, "Mein husband, mein Fritz!" Our duty as a correct historian compels us to say that Fritz hugged back as well as he knew how.—The Justice with head erect, stepped smilingly out, leaving the lovers to themselves, and walked away meditatively, a holy calm stealing all over his massive proportions, the consciousness of having done his duty gleaming in his eye, honor, honesty, and rectitude in his footsteps.—Buffalo Republicans.

A Pure Patriot.

It is pleasing to meet, in these degenerate times anything breathing the pure spirit of patriotism, and to listen sometimes to the lofty tone of the cultivated statesman. Hear one of them in the Missouri Legislature, who, on a recent occasion—it matters little upon what mid:—"What do gentlemen want? Is even so dear and hallowed an event as to be purchased only at the price of leaving our State unrepresented by our lawmen! Do you want the institutions of your States reduced to the condition of affairs every where in Georgia, where a plantation consists of two overseers and one nigger? As the poet says, "I'd rather be a long enough, strong, rather than with a political end lay at the feet of mortal creature, or even, my native State." Such is the noble sentiment of a true citizen, and we wish the institutions of long as pluck grows and water runs."

UNITED STATES ITEMS.

A precocious youngster, nineteen years old, named O'Donnell, is on trial at St. Louis for being married to three wives at the same time.

A tremendous snow-storm very late in the season, occurred in Minnesota on the 13th March. The snow fell to the depth of three feet at St. Paul, and a heavy freshet is feared.

Another slaver is reported off the coast of Louisiana, with a cargo of slaves, which she was waiting an opportunity to land.

Col. Johnston, of the New York State Agricultural Society, estimates the wheat crop of 1859 in the United States, at 158,500,000 bushels as against 180,000,000 for 1858. Why this large reduction we do not know.

Despatches received at Washington from Commissioner Bowlin speak hopefully of a peaceful settlement of the difficulties with Paraguay.

Mr. Buchanan expresses great indignation at the reported conduct of Governor Douglas, in refusing the Americans at Victoria permission to publicly celebrate Washington's Birthday. The matter is to be brought to the attention of the British Government.

A man named Foster, convicted of burglary, was executed at Charleston, S. C., on the 25th ult. South Carolina, we believe, is the only state in which burglary is punishable by death, and this is probably the only instance in which such a sentence has been carried into effect.

There is a curious report from Utah, in the correspondence of a San Francisco paper, to the effect that Brigham Young keeps within doors through fear of his life; that several of the leading Mormons are apostatizing; and that life and property are unsafe in the Territory.

The Rev. Jonathan Post, a Baptist preacher, and his wife, were killed in Marquette County, March 25, by their son.—The murderer is about 30 years old and has been insane for several years, but was thought to be harmless until this occurrence. He made no effort to escape.

Spring in Kentucky.

The Maple buds have swelled to leaflets; the brilliant sunshine and the clear blue sky are the heralds of Spring. In every garden the lillies and jonquils, with their lance-shaped leaves, are preparing to battle with the March winds, and from the windown we see peeping the superb hyacinths, tended by woman's watchful care. In a short time the lilac, the dogwood, the snow-ball, and the seringa, will be in full bloom, making the air redolent with their sweets. In fact "about these times," as the almanacs say, nature is putting on her holiday attire, and looks fresh and fair, as youth and beauty always do.—Louisville Journal, 11th.

United States Ambassadors.

Our Government is represented abroad by a pretty set of men. They are all third or fourth rate politicians, and no more fit for diplomatists than a cow boy is for a college professorship. Our Minister to France speaks only broken French. Our Minister to Spain is ignorant of Spanish. Our Minister to Germany, as a general thing, cannot tell high Dutch from Hebrew, and one of our Ministers to Italy knows equally little of Italian. Our Minister to Russia speaks no Russian. Our Minister to Constantinople cannot "talk Turkey." Our Minister to China don't know the first word of Chinese. It is stated as an offset, however, that our Minister to England can talk English, though he rarely does it to any important purpose.—N. Y. Herald.

Outlawing Editors.

Senator Fly has introduced an extraordinary bill for outlawing the editorial fraternity. It provides that no publication by a newspaper concerning a person elected by the people to any office shall be deemed libellous; but if any such elected officer should deem it so, and hence proceeds to assault and batter the editor of said libel-bearing paper, an action against him shall not lie, unless the editor be personally maimed or deprived of life thereby. Probably, however, before it passes, an amendment will be added, excusing the editor from penal responsibilities when he labours on the defensive, unless his miserable foe is knocked into irrevocable jelly, and the wind utterly and forever expelled from his presumptous carcase. So amended, it would leave a clean field and open new avenues for ambitious editors to the high seats of notoriety and consideration.—Rochester Union.

Trouble in a Roman Catholic Church.

On last Sunday afternoon there was an immense gathering in the vicinity of St. John's Church, Roman Catholic, in Fifteenth Street. The assemblage was composed of the members of the above named church, who met to hear an address from the Rev. Mr. Daymon, in vindication of himself, on the subject of his suspension by Archbishop Hughes. It appears from the facts in the case that the reverend gentleman, in a discourse to his congregation prior to his suspension, made use of the expression that "hell was paved with the skulls of bad priests,' for which, coupled with the fact that the reverend gentleman is rather too enthusiastic in his style of preaching, caused the Archbishop to order his suspension.—Rev. Mr. Daymon is a proselyte from Protestantism, and is a brother of Capt. Daymon, of the British war steamer Gorgon, of the Atlantic cable fame. He declares his intention of building a church at his own expense, and his congregation have declared their intention to follow their pastor.—N. Y. Herald.

A Mild Winter.

If those muskrats in Iowa that prophesied a mild winter survived the cold snap of January last, they may now have the satisfaction of knowing that their predictions were correct. Southern papers concur in the statement that vegetation in that latitude is at least one month in advance of ordinary years. Fruit trees are in blossom and flowers of various kinds are in full bloom. In the North the winter has been remarkably open. The great lakes have been closed by ice but a small part of the time, and navigation is now about to be resumed on all the Northern waters. The Lake Superior Journal of the 26th ult., says: "We are now within five days of the first Spring month, and have had scarcely a brush of winter yet. Most of the time it has been mild. For two weeks past there has been a briskness and a mellowness in the atmosphere which was enough to cause the meekest heart to sing for joy. Our boys have not been silenced more than a week at a time this winter, and but a few days in all. It is open now, and the 'shore birds' of the year are passing to the melting away into Spring." In our own latitude the weather has been yet less favorable. With the exception of a few days of severe weather, our climate has resembled more of the character of a Southern winter.—N. Y. Times.

Parliamentary.

In the Legislative Assembly on Saturday Mr. Foley moved a Bill to amend the Registry Act of last session.

The Bill for the separation of the United Counties of Durham and Northumberland was read a second time, and set down for a third reading on Monday.

Mr. McMicken presented a petition against the Bill to secure to married women certain separate rights of property.

The following bills were read a second time:

For the regulation of insolvency.—To consolidate the debt of the Town of Galt.—To confirm a proclamation of the Governor General, incorporating the village of Streetsville.

The following Bills were read a third time and passed:

COMMUNICATIONS.

THIS COLUMN SHALL AT ALL TIMES BE OPEN FOR COMMUNICATIONS ON INSTRUCTIVE SUBJECTS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Asphodel, April 11, 1859.

Sir,—The difficulties between the two contending parties in this Township has never been fairly and fully set before the public, unless what has been told from time to time in the columns of the Review, over the signature of "Ptomely, Jr.," and I ask a space in your colums for that purpose.

"I will extenuate nothing,
Nor set aught down in malice," but place the affair before the public for their opinion.

At the election in 1858, Messrs. Fowlds, Pearce, Harrison, Coughlan and Sargent were elected Councillors for that year, and through the whole of the year matters progressed very favorably; the Councillors above named in connection with their Clerk, James Foley, working together for the benefit of the whole people. At a session held at the Council Chamber, Norwood, on the 5th July, 1858, a By-law was passed to expend £200 on roads and bridges in the township, and the concluding clause of that By-law appointed the above-named councillors, and Walter Scott, Esq., Commissioners for the expenditure of the said £200, in different parts of the township, and dividing it into three divisions for the purpose of letting the jobs, and when performed to pass them, and if properly done to give an order on the Treasurer, J. Fowlds, for the pay. Previous to last election Mr. Councillor Harrison applied for, and got, an order for $12 for part of his pay as Commissioner for 12 days, at 7s. 6d. per day, for letting out and paving his portion of the work Walter Scott, Esq., got $12 for 8 days as Commissioner, in like manner. On the 15th day of January, 1859, after the election at which Messrs. Fowlds, Harrison, Scott, Grover and Coughlin were elected, and being the last day of meeting of the old Council for 1858, a motion was made to pay themselves as follows: Harrison, $18; Coughlan, $8.25; Sargent, $10.50; Fowlds, $4.50; Pearce, $10.50; as Commissioners for the expenditure of said £200, besides the $12 previously paid Scott, making altogether $63.75; a pretty round sum, being $12 for every $100 expended.

The legal question is simply this:—Under the new Municipal Law, can Walter Scott, Henry Fowlds, Robert Harrison, Timothy Coughlin, or any one else who has received pay in 1858 as Commissioners, sit as Councillors in 1859 in the face of the disqualification clause in the new Municipal Act, section 73, "No person receiving any allowance from the Corporation (except as Mayor, Warden, Reeve, Deputy Reeve, or Township Councillor), &c., shall be qualified to be a member of the Council of the Corporation." These men take 7s. 6d. per day as Commissioners; some of the work over which they exercise control and superintendance is still unperformed, and yet they look upon themselves as Councillors. On the first day of meeting, viz., the third Monday in January, these men met, were called to order by the Clerk, and in consequence of this law being laid down to them, they refused to take the necessary qualification of office for two days after, and not until a warrant from the Reeve for 1858 was placed in the hands of the Returning officer, to elect other four instead of those who refused.

Under these circumstances, and from the opinion of an able lawyer, the new Council were organized and have since, with Mr. Grover (who took the declaration of office on the third Monday in January, being the day appointed by law to take the necessary declarations of office) being at work, passing by-laws, &c., and the last Corporation retain the books, papers, seal, &c. I understand that a writ has been served at the instigation of the first corporation, or as we call them the old Council, on Messrs. Sargent, Morphy, Patterson and Ewing to show cause why they should not vacate their seats. This is to come off on the first day of Easter term, viz Tuesday, viz: on the 15th day of May next.

It looks as though the Judges were of opinion they were there by right, until the others show cause to the contrary. Thus the matter stands now, viz: "Show, you cause, if you can, why we should not vacate our seats."

Yours very truly,
"One who Knows."

THE ASSESSMENT

Agricultural.

Use ashes in solution, sprinkled over plants, to drive away insects.

Sprinkle cold water on frost-bitten plants, before the sun rises, or else cover them.

Wait until the sap flows before you prune, else rot will set in, and the tree perhaps be destroyed.

English onion-seeds in this country run to scallions the first year. Will they do so the second?

A writer recommends that meadows be flowed early in the Winter, and the water kept on until the ice is off in the Spring.

Hungarian grass, when cut before fully ripe, is thought equal to the best hay. A dry, upland soil is best adapted for it.

A cotemporary believes that bone-meal is as essential to cattle as salt, and that they should have as much as they can eat.

To cure a horse of kicking in his stall, fasten two feet of trace chain to each hind foot of the horse, then obliging him to punish himself every time he kicks.

A writer in the Homestead defends the use of pork as an article of wholesome diet. It was the flesh of the loathsome swine of Syria, which fed on offal, dead bodies, and flesh that Moses prohibited, not the grain-fed hog of the Canadian farm.

THE GROWING WHEAT CROP.

The advices we have from the various sections of the country leave no doubt in our minds that a large quantity of wheat has been sown, and that it looks well; and in point of growth is, in many places, fully a month earlier than it has been for the last three years. From present appearances, a dry, cool May will be absolutely necessary to mature the crop properly, and with favourable weather during that month and June, a large wheat crop may be expected.

The Reform Debate.

If anybody expected that the debate of this week would throw a clear light on the extent to which any of the governing parties is prepared to go on the question of Reform, he must feel acute disappointment. There is but too much justice in the remark that a common hypocrisy has been shown on all sides, if we except Mr. Bright and the small band of Independent Liberals who act with him. We have been made spectators of a battle for office, and not of a great constitutional struggle. The question in the country is, what changes are required to bring the representation into accord with population, property and intelligence? Parties in the House of Commons narrowed their view to the chances of a change of Ministry and the probabilities of a dissolution. The majority had their minds directed to the hustings rather than to the vital principles involved in the ultimate result. Lord J. Russell and his opponents equally avoided definite issues that would raise the whole question of Parliamentary Reform. The Government declined to fix the line beyond which they would not consent to advance, and Lord John would not point out the goal that he desired to reach. The Whig leader stuck to his amendment, and wrapped his intentions in an impenetrable mist. Copying from the late Sir Robert Peel, he refused to prescribe for the body politic until regularly called in as the national doctor. Speaking from below the gangway, on the Opposition side of the House, it was not for him to say what measure of Representative Reform ought to be proposed at the present day. That is the duty of the Government of the day to whom the initiative belongs. When Lord John led the House in 1851 and 1854, he did not hesitate to propose what he thought right, and he leaves us to infer, that, if restored to that position, he will do the same again. But no advice without the fee. It was all very well last session, when Lord Palmerston would have alone profited by their overthrow, to help a lame ministry over the stile with the India Bill. But now that he feels strong enough to bid for the direction of affairs, the situation is altered. His object is not to bar the door of office against a rival, but to break an entrance for himself. About to play a great game, he carefully masks his hand. Therefore he adhered rigidly to his text, and asked the Liberals to support his resolution because of his former character. He claimed a monopoly in Reform which "he defended when he was young, and will not desert now that he is old." He would not consent that his crown should be placed upon another head, or that any but he should reap new laurels upon the field in which he won his most enduring triumph. His tactics did not admit of his laying himself open to assault, and with the prospect of a general election in the near distance, it did not suit him to flutter the small boroughs with the terrors of disfranchisement. On the other side, Ministers were to the full as reticent, and as little candid. They declared themselves ready to consider, perhaps to accept, any amendments that might render their Bill acceptable to the Liberal party. They hinted that as they had yielded to former votes of the House in adopting the ten-pound franchise for Counties, they might be induced under similar pressure to enlarge their schedules, to obliterate decayed boroughs, and to deprive the smaller constituencies of half their present representative power. They expressed a disposition to throw their bill down on the floor of the House, and to give it up to be transformed and reconstructed, if only they were permitted to save the point of honour by passing into committee. Lord John sternly told them that it is the duty of the Government to bring forward a complete and symmetrical measure, and to be prepared to stand by all its substantial details. Ministers, with an eye to dissolution, sought to throw upon the House of Commons the harsh and difficult task of disfranchisement and retribution. Thus, although we have a long debate, we are left in ignorance of what the Tories could or would concede, as well as of what Lord John Russell is prepared to propose in the event of his accession to power. The only possible persons into whose hands the construction of a Cabinet can fall, under existing circumstances, are on a settled determination to keep us in the clouds as to the Reform that may be expected or extracted from them.

We have already described Lord John Russell's motion as a parliamentary manœuvre, and such is its character. He grappled with the Government on the weakest part of their measure, which also, unfortunately for them, even rebounded on main principles. He did not broadly meet the Bill with a direct negative, a course which would have compelled him to point out its shortcomings, and to explain the policy which he would substitute for theirs. He raised, instead, a collateral issue, upon which the Government were likely to become the support of some of their own party, and upon which it was probable that the votes of all sections of Liberals would be united. He assisted Ministers in fault by attacking the clauses which provided that the suffrage in Counties and boroughs should be uniform, and that all freeholders resident in boroughs, who had hitherto voted for their counties, should vote for the boroughs alone. As incident to this, he called upon the House to declare that there ought to be a greater retention of suffrage in boroughs than is provided by the Government Bill. We do not here quote for our commentary Lord Stanley's argument against Lord John urged in support of the contest right of the Government to frame and submit their own measure. He had no right to urge that argument in the House. He had no right to urge that argument in the House. He had no right to urge that argument in the House ented his Lordship to the venerable Secretary, whom he exceedingly courteous, but entirely informal, conversation ensued.—Secretary Cass took occasion to compliment the retiring Minister, Lord Napier, in very warm language.

Lord Lyons will be presented to President Buchanan to-day, and, immediately after his reception, will be enrolled at the the foot of the diplomatic list, on which Lord Napier's name stood as No. 11.—Lord Lyons brings with him Mr. Irvine as Secretary of Legation, and Hon. Mr. Monsts as Private Secretary.

Washington, April 12, 1859.

Yesterday Lord Napier presented his letter of recall, and took leave of the President in his character of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Britanic Majesty, and the customary expressions of good will were interchanged.

To-day Lord Lyons was introduced by the Secretary of State as successor of Lord Napier, and addressed the President as follows:—

Mr. President,—My first duty in addressing you as the Envoy of Her Britanic Majesty is in obedience to her Majesty's express command to assure you of Her esteem and regard for you, and of her hearty wishes for the welfare of the greatest nation of which you are the Chief Magistrate. Her Majesty has nothing more at heart than to maintain the friendship and good understanding so happily existing between the government of Great Britain and that of the United States. The vast importance of the relations between the two countries would cause me to tremble in entering upon the duties of the highly honorable post to which the confidence of my sovereign has called me; I am sustained, however, by the conviction that the good will and kind feeling which animate the government and the people will remedy my personal deficiencies I must entreat you, sir, to view with indulgence the humble efforts which I shall constantly make to merit your approbation and to give effect to the cordial and friendly intentions of the Queen and of her Majesty's government. I have now, sir, the honor to place in your hands the letter of credence which her Majesty has been graciously pleased to entrust to my care.

Upon receiving the letter of credence from Lord Lyons, the President made the following remarks:—

My Lord—I give you a cordial welcome as the diplomatic representative of your sovereign to the government of the United States. I receive with much gratification the expression of her Majesty's hearty wishes for the welfare of the United States, as well as her earnest desire to maintain the friendship and good understanding now so happily existing between our respective governments. These assurances, proceeding from a sovereign who is universally esteemed by the people of the United States, and by none of them more than myself, are calculated to produce the best effect on the relations between the two countries. On our part these sentiments are cordially reciprocated towards her Majesty and the British people. You cannot appreciate too highly the importance to the people both of Great Britain and the United States of maintaining the most free and friendly commercial and political intercourse with each other. This desirable end will be best secured by a frank and manly diplomacy so congenial to the character of the two nations, and, so far as known to us, to your own character.

The President is much gratified by the emphatic language of the new envoy, which far transcends the formal phraseology usual on such occasions.

Death of Mr. John Anderson, late Janitor of Queen's College, Kingston.

It is with profound sorrow that we make known the death of Mr. John Anderson.—This event took place on the 2nd of February. The death of Mr. Anderson will be learned with sorrow by those of our readers who have been educated at Queen's College.

Mr. Anderson was born in Berwickshire, Scotland. He came to this country in 1830, and was since that time engaged in several parts of the Province. In 1851 he was appointed Janitor of Queen's College, an office he has held to the satisfaction of Trustees, Professors and Students. The interests of the College lay deep in his heart. He laboured to promote the comfort and happiness of the students in every way that he possibly could. He had the confidence of all connected with the institution. By the Professors he was respected and beloved. He was always willing to advise the students in anything that tended to promote their welfare.

For sometime past he complained of a disease of the throat. About four months ago, Dr. George and several others endeavored to induce him to go to Scotland, thinking that by such a step his health might be improved. He did not see his way clear for taking that course, but stated that if God spared him till next summer he would do so.

When his disease assumed a serious aspect, it was thought advisable that he should retire from the College buildings, so that there could be more attention paid to him while living with a family. No influence could be made to bear upon him to leave the College. A few weeks before he died Dr. George requested the Divinity Students to sit with him at night as he had no brother, wife or sister, a request with which the students complied. All who attended him considered it was not only a duty but also a privilege to sit with him, for his conversation was of such a nature that it benefited those who heard it. The Professors visited him daily. He was delighted to see them, and more especially when they expounded the portions of Scripture which they read. His beloved and esteemed pastor, Dr. Machar, paid him the greatest attention. His visits to his dying saint were blessings. For many years Mr. Anderson was a member of his church.—He took a deep interest in the Sabbath School.

Dr. George called every evening to read and pray with him. His sufferings were very great, and, when any spoke to him of them, his answer generally was: "I have only a short way to go now. I will soon be home in my Master's house." To a friend who called on him he said: "I believe that it was Providence that prevented me in not leaving the College. I don't know what I would have done. I would have been lost had it not been for the prayers of the young men who have attended me. I am indebted to the church for them. I am indebted to you all." To the writer one evening when conversing about the joys of heaven, he said: "I intended, if God spared me, to go home to see my father in Scotland, but it seems that it is appointed otherwise. I am going to another Father; to another and better country. Oh how pleasant to be thought prepared."

Besides possession of a number of the above articles, he bequeathed no fortune. His property consisted for the most part of his salary. He has left a widow and family to mourn their loss. But they sorrow not as those who have no hope. They have the consolation of knowing that he died in the Lord, and they have the promise that God will be a father to the fatherless and a husband to the widow.

The most touching scene of his death-bed was on one occasion when a student called to take farewell of him. Raising in his bed he said: "I know how that you are placed. I know that your poor mother has had difficulties in getting you educated. You will never be able to repay her. Do not forget her. But above all, do not forget God.—Seek him now, and oh, it will be well with you at a death-bed."

Visit him when you might, the same spirit was manifested; always happy. Never was there a frown or a fret. With the will of God he complied.

The day on which he died many people came to see him. During the middle of the day he seemed to revive a little, but it was only for a short time. The cup was about full; the scenes of eternal world were bursting before him At the close of the Theological class Dr. George called, but it was for the last time to find him in life.—Scarcely had he finished a few sentences of prayer when without a sigh, the spirit took its flight to the realms of eternal day. It was deemed proper to close the College until the funeral was over. The morning on which the funeral was to take place Professor Mowat intimated to the students that they were to attend it in their gowns. At two o'clock in the afternoon the professors, students and public met in Dr. Williamson's class-room, when Dr. Machar delivered a touching address on the text, "Oh taste and see that God is good." To the memory and character of the deceased Dr. Machar did ample justice. After a very impressive prayer was offered by Dr. George, the students followed the funeral to the outside of the city, the day being so cold that they were unable to proceed further.

Never was there a more triumphant display of piety as in the case of John Anderson. The scenes of his death-bed will ever be fresh in the memory of those who witnessed them. His name will be long remembered by the professors and students. He was sensible of his approaching dissolution, and for it he prepared. His Lord and Saviour did not forsake him when death was approaching. He was sustained under his heavy afflictions. He bore them meekly. His discourse was such as became a dying man, and more especially a dying saint. He possessed uncommon joys. His soul was supported with the pleasing hope of a glorious immortality. His views of Christ were clear. His piety was of the highest order. His love to God was strong. No passages of Scripture seemed so precious and refreshing as those which unfold the glorious character of Christ. No conversation so pleasing as that which gathered all our thoughts around the Cross. No hymns so sweet as those in which every line breathe the love of Jesus.

He is gone from amongst us. That pleasing countenance, which presented itself at the door of the class-room when the bell was rung for prayer, is not to be seen now. But, thank God we mourn his loss not like those who have no hope. May God grant that all of us, who were delighted in his company on earth, may spend an eternity together in that place where the lamb in the midst of the Throne shall lead us to the wells of living water, and God shall wipe all tears from all eyes.

William Darrach.

Queen's College, March 14, 1859.

P. S.—We may notice that it is the intention of the trustees of the College to place over his grave a marble slab.

What is True Education?

Hugh Miller, the well known geologist, who died lately in Scotland, was a prominent instance of what true education does for a man. We say true education, because though he had never studied in a college, Hugh Miller was educated, in the highest sense of the term. In other words, not only was his mind thoroughly disciplined, but whatever he learned at all he completely assimilated, so that it became his own. His career shows what energy, perseverance and industry, can do for a man born under the most unfavourable circumstances; for though originally but a poor lad, though only a journey-man stone mason till after his majority, he rose to one of the most prominent men of Great Britain—a writer of acknowledged ability, and the leading editor of a principle party in Scotland. In his "Autobiography," published a few years since, he has left a narrative of his boyhood which is worth almost its worth in gold to young men about beginning in life. Had he written nothing else, he would have left, in that work, an invaluable legacy to his race.

For, nowhere, not even in the autobiography of Franklin, is the great truth so forcibly illustrated that all men who have become eminent owe their success less to school-masters than to themselves. It is self-discipline, after all, that wins the battle. There were thousands of youth, contemporary with the boy, Hugh Miller, enjoying every advantage of education, and many of them possessed of no inconsiderable ability, who never figure in after life, while the poor lad, whose principal teacher was nature, who possessed no books but a bible, and who consumed some of his best years in hewing stone, rose to become famous in both letter and science. This distinction he achieved by omitting no opportunity of acquiring knowledge. It was in quarrying stone in a wild district, for example, that he made the world-renowned geological discovery which upset the brilliant but delusive theories of the famous "Vestiges of Creation," and achieved his own reputation.—His fellow workmen enjoyed the same opportunity of winning this great distinction, but they let the fossil fish, which settled the problem, pass unnoticed; and so they died, or will die, unknown stone masons, labouring at a half a dollar a day, while the deceased of their companion, fills two continents with grief.

Another thing is proved by the career of Hugh Miller. It is that it is better to master a few books, than to read carelessly a dozen libraries or more. To be plain, study is valuable, not merely for the facts it gives a man, but for the habit of thinking it imparts. He who voraciously swallows volumes upon volumes never gives himself time to digest his intellectual food. He becomes, consequently, a mere smatterer. He understands no principles. He is really worse educated than the man who has read but few books, provided those books were good ones, and have been thoroughly assimilated. Hugh Miller never left a book till he had made it completely his own.—What Hugh Miller did, every man who would become great in literature has but to do, whether born poor, like Miller, or bred up with every advantage of schools and colleges. Men who wish to be really educated must study for themselves. The bill of knowledge can not be filled by deputy. Hence the difference in mearing an education, between the rich man's son and poor man's son, is less than is generally supposed. In truth, the self-culture which limited circumstances give to the latter may almost be considered the counterbalance to the advantages of wealth and position. It is a certain fact that distinguished writers, who have risen from the ranks of life, have usually been more highly educated than those who have passed through the usual routine of a University education.

The Postage on Newspapers.

Post-master General Smith's bill to impose a postage on Newspapers will likely become law in a short time. The rate of postage is as follows:—

For Daily Papers.....	$1 60	per annum.
" Tri-weekly.....	80 "	"
" Semi-weekly.....	55 "	"
" Weekly.....	27 "	"

We cannot speak too condemnatory of such a measure. It is one of the most convincing evidences we have on record of the unfitness of the Ministry who now profess to represent the majority of the people of Canada, to govern the country. Reckless measures have been introduced from time to time by this Administration, directly in opposition to the wish of the people, and have been met with some degree of disapprobation, but never, perhaps, under the administration of the Cartier-Macdonald Ministry, have the intelligent people of our Province had more cause to complain than at the postage law of Mr. Post-master General Smith.

It was set up as a plea in justification of this imposition on the intelligence of the people that it was necessary, in order to meet the expenses of the Postal Department; yet we find these same gentlemen who are so careful that the credit of the country be sustained, voting themselves the sum of $6 per day, ($2 more than their legal pay), and $10,000 for the support of the Canada Gazette, a paper published for the use of members of the House to send to their friends throughout the Province that they might not be under the necessity of purchasing wrapping paper at their own expense. Verily, this is an age of economy, and our Government are model economists!

We have the painful duty of announcing the death of Mr. John Anderson, late Janitor of Queen's College, Kingston. Mr. Anderson was a resident of Peterboro, some years ago, and it is no doubt with feelings of sorrow that many of our eldest townsmen, and especially those of them who were with himself, Scotchmen, will read this announcement. He was esteemed by all who ever had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and was marked for his acts of benevolence, and his untiring zeal in the cause of humanity. He died rejoicing in the praise of a Saviour's love.

In another column will be found an article from the "Presbyterian" on the subject.

Dr. Burnham lectures this evening in the Town Hall, on "Mesmerism." This is the fourth of a course of Lectures, under the auspices of the Mechanics' Institute, which are to be continued for three or four weeks longer. The Lectures will be, no doubt, of great benefit to those who may avail themselves of this opportunity. The Lecture on last Thursday evening by the Rev. Mr. Gilmour was one of the finest we have ever listened to on the subject, and we regret that the inclemency of the weather prevented so many from attending. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gilmour will repeat his very interesting lecture on the "Management of Life," at some early day.

Homicide.

We understand that an affray of a fatal character occurred lately in the Township of Douro. It appears that on Sunday last, two young men named Griswell, and Clarke meeting together, had repaired to the Tavern commonly known as the Tin Ine, (on the Dummer Road,) where, it is stated, they procured a bottle of whiskey. Leaving the premises with the whiskey in their possession, they went to a neighbouring farm for the purpose of quietly drinking the liquor. Nothing further was known of the transaction until evening, when the young man Clarke, was found in an adjoining field insensible, and on examination was found to be very badly beaten. He was taken home, where he expired the following day. It is supposed that they had quarrelled, and, being under the influence of liquor Griswell, had beaten Clarke, so as to have caused death. We have no further particulars on the subject at present. Circumstances of this nature are far too numerous, and is to be hoped the guilty party will be brought to justice.

The Rice Lake Ice.

Navigation on the Rice Lakes is open. The Wenebanee has already made one trip to Rice Lake, and the Fly is expected down to-day. The Lakes are almost entirely free from ice, and nothing will be likely to interfere with the regular trips of the steamers.

The Spring Show of Horses will be held on the Market Square, on Saturday.

The trunk on the Rice Lake Bridge has been repaired, and the cars on the Cobourg Road have resumed their semi-occasional trips.

The 100th Regiment on the March from Shorncliffe to Aldershot Camp.

We have been favored with the following extract from a letter received by the last mail from England and written by an officer of another regiment on a visit at Shorncliffe camp.

"The next day the 100th band played on the promenade near the sea shore; they played beautifully several selections from operas, and were led by the band master, who is a first rate one. On Wednesday morning the regiment left shorncliffe camp en route for Aldershot, and a more beautiful and imposing sight I never saw. They fell in about 6.15 am., and at 6.30 they marched off 1,150 strong led by three bands, the 11th hussars, the Dublin militia and their own. They played the usual tunes on starting, "the girl I left behind me" and 'good by sweet one, good by' * * * * carried the colors, it was a lovely sight to see the long line of as fine a regiment as there is in the service, winding down the side of the hill leaving the camp and entering Sandgate. The morning was beautifully clear, and the whole of the Dublin militia met them on the brow of the hill, and gave the 100th three cheers which were responded to in grand style. They are certainly a most noble body of men and the most extraordinary thing was that not a single man was absent from parade out of the whole regiment—such a thing in camp wherein is so easy to get out is unprecedented. The band of the 11th halted outside of Sandgate after playing the 100th through the town, and taking up a position on the side of the road and played "should auld acquaintance be forgot" as the regiment marched by, and it had a very pretty effect. They marched on to Calkestone, where everybody had turned out to meet them. There a special train was in waiting to carry them to Farnham, whence they would march to Aldershot camp.—Middlesex Prototype.

Wheat growing in Canada.

It has been a generally received opinion, that by far the largest portion of Upper Canada is, from soil and climate, peculiarly adapted to the production of wheat, particularly the winter varieties. The Genesee country in the neighbouring State of New York has, till recently been highly distinguished for the abundance and superior quality of its wheat; and we have in our own western peninsula a wide tract of land, extending to the shores of Lake Huron, comprising similar soils, and resting upon the extension of the same geological formation as prevail in western New York.—In the centre and west of that State, wheat-culture of late years has been gradually contracted; and in some formerly favored districts which used to produce thirty bushels and upwards, per acre, this crop has been almost entirely abandoned. Judging from results of the last few seasons, we are in a fair way of following the example.—The evil has been gradually, and therefore to some, perhaps, almost unobservedly coming upon us, till of late the crop has been reduced in amount from thirty to forty per cent, below the ordinary average of former years. The yield of last season, as shown some months ago, in the able report on the subject by the pains-taking and efficient Secretary of the Bureau of Agriculture and Statistics, was extremely deficient. And this circumstance, coming in the wake of a commercial panic, almost unparalled for its sudden and wide spread of desolation, is sufficient to account for our present depressed and embarrassed condition.

Without attempting, at present, an analysis of this complex and difficult subject, which has already engaged the serious attention of many of the best statesmen, agriculturists, and men of science, on this continent, we may observe that the two chief proximate causes of the failure in wheat have been the midge and rust.—These evils have not taken us by surprise, but have been coming on by degrees; in some seasons more marked than others, yet upon the whole, progressively increasing in the extent and intensity of their effects.—In the absence of any reliable specific, which the most rigid investigators have hitherto been unable to discover, we may be permitted to offer a few plain and practical suggestions in the hope rather of mitigating than of effecting an immediate removal of the evil; the latter being, we fear, at present far beyond the reach of human agency.

And first, when we properly consider the extremely imperfect manner in which land is generally prepared for wheat, and the short intervals allowed between the same kind of crops, a certain deterioration both in quantity and quality is a result that might naturally be expected. We have been persevering in the practice of extracting, incessant grain crops of a near affinity, those various constituents, without a certain proportionate amount of which no soil can be fertile, or profitably cultivated. As rich virgin soils are commonly found to yield a succession of bountiful crops under a rude and imperfect culture, farmers unwisely, and perhaps, unconsciously, have been induced to persist in the system till they discovered, to their cost, that their land refused its wonted returns. Shallow and imperfect ploughing, with an occasional scratching of the surface and covering the seed by the harrow, in the rudest manner, have too generally been considered sufficient for the mechanical preparation of the seed bed.—And in addition to all this, land is too commonly kept in grain crop, without often any kind of manure, till it refuses to yield a profitable return.

Secondly—Land intended for wheat should not only be naturally adapted to the plant, and receive a deep and thorough cultivation, and when necessary a proper manuring, but it must also be sound and dry. This latter condition is the one most essential, in the absence of which, manures, and the most perfect cultivation may be, to a great extent, thrown away. In wet lands, however rich they may be in all the elements of fertility, draining is an essential preliminary to the profitable raising of grain, especially wheat. If this simple condition were obtained, we should hear comparatively little complaint of the rust, winter-killing, &c. A wet soil is always cold and late, the opposite of which, viz: warm and early, are of the greatest consequence in wheat-culture.

We would by no means insinuate that these few but, as they appear to us, most important precautions, would in all situations and in all seasons, render our wheat crop invulnerable and infallible, especially against that now two centuries old dire depredator pest—the midge. But we only offer the weed of suggestion, with the belief that under ordinary circumstances, and in moderate quantity, taken we say this through unsuitability of soil and climate, both of which may frequently be modified by art, want of drainage, sowing wheat too rapidly in succession, or otherwise over-cropping, too late sowing, with imperfect cultivation, and impure or inferior, dirty seed, are the chief and often the only causes of producing a sickly wheat plant, (and instead of whatever other crop that may be cultivated,) thereby rendering it peculiarly fitted to be afflicted by the midge, or any other species of blight, in the numerous catalogue of disasters which afflict our grain crops.

Thirdly—The judicious selection of such varieties of wheat as are suited to particular soils and climate, with an occasional change of seed and strict attention to its purity and uniformity of ripening, are matters which demand special attention.—As a general rule early sowing, leaving the precise time to be determined by the character of the season, the mechanical and chemical condition of the soil and local circumstances, is a consideration of by no means secondary importance. If the land be very light and porous, the application of a heavy roller would be beneficial; and sowing with the drill, when practicable is always to be preferred. The seed is in this way more regularly deposited and evenly covered, there securing a greater uniformity in germination, growth and ripening, and rendering the young plant far more secure against the effects, or as it is termed "heaving out," to the alteration of freezing and thawing in early spring.

If the ravages of insects, rust, &c., should unfortunately prove too powerful against the spirit of these, and similar suggestions, when faithfully applied, which we certainly do not believe would be generally the case, no other alternative seems to remain, but the total abandonment of wheat growing for, at least, a few years. This extreme expedient, to which farmers will almost reluctantly resort, was actually carried out some years since in the Lower Province, in the Eastern States, and more recently in some section of the adjoining State of New York; and the ultimate results have unquestionably been beneficial. We are in a much better position now to forego,—if we should really come to that,—the raising of wheat, than we should have been only a few years since, when that article was almost the only one for which the farmer could readily obtain cash. It is not so now. Notwithstanding the serious loss and inconvenience which Canada would experience by being deprived of her usual wheat crop, for which hitherto our soil and climate have proved so highly favourable; still we must not despond, as the growing of wheat does not comprehend the whole of our agriculture. Spring grains, and especially the breeding, rearing and fattening of improved breeds of live stock, could be beneficially made to occupy a more prominent and profitable position, than has hitherto been the case; and in the course of a few years the soil would be refreshed for the growth of wheat, under new and more favorable circumstances.

But to this extreme alternative, we hope and believe that there is no necessity to go. A vigorous and systematic effort to avert the present threatening destruction of our hitherto staple crop, must be unitedly and immediately made. The evil is already in our mid t, and is seriously imparing both the agricultural and commercial well being of the country. We earnestly entreat our farmers to confine their wheat culture to naturally suitable soils, and to increase that suitably by all the appliances of improved systems of husbandry they can command. Of wheat, and perhaps some other kinds of grain—for a while at least—cultivate less and cultivate better.—Land exhausted by too frequently recurring grain crops, when properly laid down to pasture, will become gradually enriched and restored by the grazing of cattle and sheep which can now be made a profitable branch of husbandry. Hemp and flax, and probably some other crops, not yet tried, might be advantageously introduced.—Agriculturist.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

THE FRENCH EMPIRE.

Paris.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Tuileries on Wednesday afternoon, the Emperor presiding. The public mind has been distracted by conflicting rumors, and the consequence has been that confidence is a good deal shaken. This state of things seem likely to continue until something definate is settled.

The Moniteur states that Russia proposes a Congress to prevent further difficulties upon the Italian question, the Congress to be composed of the plenipotentiaries of France, Austria, England, Prussia and Russia, the place of meeting to be some neutral city. The Emperor adheres to the proposition of the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh; the Cabinets of London, Vienna and Berlin have not yet replied officially. In consequence of representations made by M. Cavour, the French Government consents that Piedmont and the other Italian States shall be represented at the conference. It is said that Austria accepts the conference.

The Moniteur publishes an account of the review on Sunday last. It states that after the troops had defiled past, the Emperor repaired to the Pont de Jena, and gave orders to the sentinels to allow the crowd to approach. His Majesty was surrounded by an immense concourse of people, which rushed with precipitation almost under the feet of the horses, shouting with the greatest enthusiasm the cry of "Vive l'Empereur!" No accident whatever happened from this demonstration, which was quite spontaneous on the part of the public.

The Moniteur also contains a report by Delangle on the subject of Protestant worship in France. Henceforth, in order to increase the guarantees for liberty of worship, the authority for the opening of new Protestant chapels, meeting-places, &c., will be granted, not by perfects, but by the Emperor, in his Council of State.

AUSTRIA.

Vienna.—The Ost Deutsche Post warns the public not to place too much confidence in peaceful reports, and says that it is very doubtful whether a congress of European powers will be convoked.

It is stated that the Emperor has made Lord Crowley a Grand Cross of the Order of Leopold—a distinction which has been conferred on no other foreign ambassador but M. de Bourqueney.

The Imperial Law Gazette contains a decree prohibiting the exportation of arms, gunpowder, and sulphur to the Italian States.

PRUSSIA.

We read in the Independance:—"The communication from Vienna which contains the denial of Austria's concurrence in the proposal of a congress, also informs us that the Archduke John will go on a confidential mission to the court of Prussia. The mission is, very probably, in some way connected with the differences that have lately arisen between the two principal states of Germany, with regard to the court of Frankfort's homogeneity with the German confederation, and of her fidelity of action as an Austrian Bundesprasidialgesandte."

"The Berlin correspondent informs us of the existence of a new Prussian note on this question. The Minister for Foreign Affairs very firmly maintains the position which he had already taken up in former dispatches on this subject. He declares distinctly that Prussia is essentially a grand independent Power, and that in this capacity she is willing to remove such overtures as may be made to her by the Frankfort diet in its corporate character, but that she cannot in any way acknowledge that she is bound to listen to a proposal coming from an isolated Power."

SWITZERLAND.

Berne.—A letter states, that the Military Council previously spoken of, and consisting of eight federal colonels, is now sitting in that city to decide on the measures which it may be desirable for Switzerland to adopt under present circumstances.

The Federal Council has increased to 400f. the export duty on horses leaving the Swiss territory. This new duty comes into immediate operation.

SPAIN.

Madrid.—The Chamber at a secret meeting on Monday evening, heard the explanation of M. Collantes, former minister. He presented his justification based on the practice of other ministers.

The Madrid journals of the 19th do not contain any political views of importance. The Chamber of Commerce of Barcelona had sent an address to the Government protesting against the idea of Cuba being sold to the United States, and expressing the opinion that an attempt will be made to take it by force. The Espanu had again been ordered for prosecution for a seditious libel. The Senate had commenced the discussion of the extraordinary budget of 2,000,000,000 reals recently adopted by the Chamber of Deputies.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon.—On the 15th instant, after the opening of the session of the Cortes, the Marquis de Loule declared that in view of the difficulties attending the definitive constitution of the Cabinet, the Ministers had tendered their resignation to the King, which had been accepted, and that the Duke de Terceira had been entrusted with the formation of a new Ministry.

As far as can be learnt the Ministry has been constituted as follows:—President of the Council, War and Foreign Affairs, Duke de Terceira; Interior, Signor Fontes; Finance, Casal Ribeiro; Justice, Martens Ferrao; Public Works, Piemental; Marine, Signor Ferreira.

The Portuguese ship of the line Vasco da Gama has arrived, on her return voyage from Loanda, whither she was dispatched with convicts. During the passage home a fire broke out in the forecastle, but was speedily extinguished.

The weather still continues warm and dry, and the farmers are hoping for rain.

ITALY.

Piedmont.—Turin.—On the 21st instant a picket of Austrian cavalry crossed to the Piedmontese side of the Ticino for the purpose of exploring the frontiers opposite Paria, which done they returned to that town.

To-day, the annual commemoration of the Piedmontese soldiers slain at the battle of Novara, in 1849, was celebrated in the Cathedral. The ceremony was solemnised in the most impressive manner. The ministers of state, deputations from Parliament, the officers of the Sardinian army, and of the National Guard, the students of the University, and the immigrants from other parts of Italy were present.

Advices have been received from Genoa to the 18th. Volunteers from Tuscany continue to arrive in companies of twenty. The authorities of Tuscany permit their departure. It is asserted that France intends to protest against the construction of fortifications by the Austrians in Piacenza.

Lombardy.—The official Milan Gazette confirms the rumor that M. Ripamonti, editor of a Newspaper, has been assassinated in Pavia.

It has been reported that the Sardinian consul has been recalled.

Tuscany.—Letters from Tuscany state that Government has seized a pamphlet bearing the signatures Ridolfi, Ricasoli, Peruzzi, and others, which protests against the treaties existing between Austria and the minor Italian States. This circumstance has produced considerable agitation in Tuscany, and addresses for signature, expressing the feeling of Tuscan people, are now circulating through the country.

Central Italy.—Numerous arrests have taken place in Modena, Parma, Piacentia, and Legborn. A vast conspiracy has, it is said, been discovered in those provinces, which was to lead to a general insurrection about the end of this month. The persons most seriously compromised, although they do not belong to Austria have been sent to the prisons of the Tyrol.

Rome.—According to the advices to the 17th inst. General Gramont has again received a note from Cardinal Antonelli, requesting the immediate evacuation of the States of the Church by the French troops.

TURKEY AND THE EAST.

Constantinople.—Advices have been received to the 16th.

Long conferences have taken place between the Ambassador of Austria and the Grand Vizer. The English ambassador is said to have represented to the Porte, that if the latter will yield to the wishes of the Roumain people with respect to the election of Hospodars, England on her part will call upon the capitalists of Europe, will found a new bank, and schools, and will construct public roads and railways in Turkey.

The Ottoman Commissioner in Belgrade has protested against the proclamation of Prince Milech, in which he claims for hereditary and his family authority as an hereditary ruler

It is stated that fresh reinforcements will be dispatched to the strong places on the Danube. Prince Couza intends visiting that part of Bessarabia which is annexed to Moldavia.

According to advices from Persia the Shah will proclaim at the Camp of Sultanies reforms which Feruhh Khan had elaborated.

AMERICA, &c.

The steamer City of Baltimore, from New York on the 12th inst., has arrived. The news is unimportant. The extraordinary session of the Senate closed on the 10th. The prospects of an extra session of Congress continued to be canvassed.

An attempt was made to burn down the town of Boston, during the sitting of the Legislature, which caused great excitement and both houses adjourned for a time. The flames were extinguished before much damage was done. The incendiaries escaped detection.

A telegram from New Orleans contains the following intelligence from Mexico:—"The Liberals were concentrating for the long premised attack upon the capital. Miramon was hastening towards Vera Cruz. In the order of preparations for defending the latter city, Resident Jamaretal decree all the troops from the other cities down to the Coast, and it was hoped the Conservatives might cause the cessation to exist forced loans at such unprotected points. General Ampudia had lately declared for the constitution, carrying over to the Liberal cause his force of 500 men." The statement that Mr. McLane, the new Minister to Mexico, had received orders to recognise the Juarez or Miramon Government is said to be wholly unfounded.

AUSTRALIA.

Business was very dull, owing to the Christians holidays. A great storm and loss of life had taken place at some of the diggings. An examination was going on at Sydney respecting the alleged Customs frauds.

The Samuel, Wm. F. Fothergill, Augusta Amelia, Forest, and Monarch, all from London, and the Tasmania, from Liverpool, had arrived at Melbourne. The Samuel spoke with the Aurora, Australia, Clonturf, and W. Lloyd. The Woolemooloo left Sydney for London, 19th of January. The Thames had also left Geelong for London.

Late from Jamaica.

SAFETY OF THE MISSING BOAT OF THE STEAMER "JASSEUR"—THE INSURRECTION QUELLED.

We have advices from Jamaica to the 30th of March. The most interesting event is the recovery of the missing boat from H. B. M. steamer Jasseur. The boat was fallen in with by a small coasting schooner named the Emeline, which vessel was on her route from Kingston to one of our out ports. The Kingston Journal says: The Emeline, while proceeding on a voyage to the westward of this island, one of the crew espied a boat containing the sufferers, for whose rescue the greatest efforts were made. When taken on board they were found to have been reduced to the most deplorable state from starvation, having been exposed nineteen days to the weather, without provision or water. One of the men died from starvation, and the doctor and purser had gone mad. It is to be hoped that by prompt attention they may recover. The poor sufferers were carried into Port Royal.

The outbreak among the coloured population on the western part of the island of Jamaica, brief mention of which was made in the last advices, had been entirely quelled. Forty of the ringleaders had surrendered themselves, being indicated and held to bail for trial. Governor Darling had issued a proclamation offering large rewards for the arrest of others. There had been some apprehension of a renewed outbreak when these rioters were brought to trial, but the government would effectually provide for that contingency. A negro, named Roach, was the instigator of the movement.

A Poor Girl's Sympathy for the Neapolitan Patriots.

Signor Filopanti communicates the following incident to a contemporary:—As the procession of the Neapolitan exiles was defiling from Paddington to the centre of London, a young girl, about fourteen years old, poorly dressed and barefooted, accosted a cab in which was M. Porcaro, one of the lately freed patriots, and put a shilling in his hand, then rapidly withdrew, without giving him time to refuse. She next went to another cab, and did the same thing with M. Fanatano, another of the Neapolitan patriots. A third Italian gentleman ran after her, and tendered her back her two shillings, with thanks on the part of M. Porcaro and M. Fontano, but she refused to take them back. Being asked her name, she answered Mary Stevens. It seems to me that such an act, on the part of a poor girl, is honourable not only to her, but to the country she belongs to. When M. Porcaro related to me this affecting incident I saw a tear in the venerable patriot's eyes. M. Fonatano said to me, "I will make a hole in this coin, and preserve it to the end of my days as a sacred relic."—London Star.

Ecmention of Children.

If we complain that with our best endeavors, our efforts for the education of our children fail in many ways, and that our most beautiful hopes disappoint us; if the youth complains that he enjoys so little of the most beautiful time of life, and that he ever feels burdened by hard fetters; and if we complain that the child hastens to become a boy, and the boy a man; that in this haste, many a beautiful soul overtasks itself, and so society receives only indifferent, useless and exhausted labourers; these are the fruits of a vain anxiety for the future. Let us not anticipate the order of nature. Let us understand that we can work best for the future by doing each day, at each period, that which, without regard to a later time, is the best and most beneficial. If we think less of what our children as boys and men are to become, than what as children they should be, if we only seek for them, and to develop in them that which will make their childish life beautiful, and in its way perfect, if with our love we accompany, rather than force the development of human nature; then the instructions we impart to our children, the wise guidance which we are able to give them, will procure for them the best places in life, and without our care, will provide best for the future.—Schleiermacher.

A Loss of Three Thousand Lives.

Near Taganrog, on the sea of Azoff, a catastrophe occurred, about the beginning of February last, which involved a loss of life unparalled except by memorable earthquake or volcanic eruptions. It appears that some three thousand inhabitants of Taganrog, relying upon the promises of fair weather made by the genial atmosphere and the cloudless sky, proceeded to the Azoff Sea to indulge in the sport of fishing beneath the ice,—a favourite pastime of that region. The atmosphere continuing serene, the party were lulled into a feeling of security, and ventured farther than usual upon the ice, in the hope of obtaining a good haul. Suddenly a breeze sprung up from the east, which growing boisterous by degrees, whirled the loose snow and fine particles of ice in all directions, and before long succeeded in detaching the ice from the shore. The ice fields then broke into numerous pieces, which with their terrified and helpless human freight, drifted towards the open sea. No assistance could be rendered the unhappy beings by their frantic relatives, and friends on shore, and within two hours not a sign of life was visible on the surface of the sea. On the following day a cake of ice drifted on shore, upon which were five of the unfortunates—three of them dead, and the two other numb and insensible. The two latter—a girl and an old man—were restored by means of the usual appliances, the girl however, survived but a few hours, the man recovered, but lost the use of his tongue—a consequence, probably, of the fright caused by the event, for had perished through. He prepared a written narrative of the occurrence of that fearful night on the Azoff. By this catastrophe at least three thousand persons found a watery grave.

The departure of the Prince Albert from Galway is postponed to the 9th inst.

The British Ministry were defeated on the Reform Bill by the decisive vote of 330 to 291, on the motion for a second reading. Previous to the vote, there was an exciting debate, in which Messrs. Peel, Roebuck, and others spoke in opposition to the bill, and Mr. Disraeli wound up with an elaborate effort in defence of the Government. The House immediately adjourned till the 4th inst. The resignation of the Ministry was generally anticipated.

Austria is said to have refused the proposition that Baden should be the place of meeting for the proposed Congress. The French Government had consequently left the choice to Austria, stipulating, however, that the selected place must be in communication with Paris by railway and telegraph.

The latest advices state that Piedmont was not to be admitted into the Congress as one of the great powers, Austria and Russia having formally protested against her admission on any other terms than those allowed to the Italian States. The preliminary conditions which Austria insists upon with regard to this Congress, render it even doubtful whether the meeting will be feasible; one of these conditions being that Piedmont shall disarm—which the latter Power positively refuses to do. Count Cavour had returned to Turin, having secured his object with Napoleon. He is believed to be bent on war. The review of the army of Paris is fixed for Sunday, April 3. All officers in Paris on leave of absence, had received orders to join their regiments.

The Paris correspondence of the London Daily News says that notwithstanding the accelerated and notorious preparations for war, the French journals have generally moderated their tones, and that this had been done on the invitation of the Minister of the interior.

The Skunk Skin Trade.

From the N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

The odor of the skunk possesses a distinctive property which cannot be mistaken by any whose sense of smell is at all discriminative. During the past few months these who have perambulated our downtown business streets have repeatedly had their olfactories greeted by the unmistakeable perfume, and wondering whence it originated, have at length traced it to the warehouses of our furriers. [A few inquiries might have explained the cause of this new accession to the two-and-seventy stenches of the metropolis.

The traffic in skunk skins has suddenly become a most important branch of the fur trade, and the skins of an animal which three years ago were deemed of no value whatever, are now in the greatest demand. They are collected for explorations alone. The principle markets are Russia and Turkey, though some are sent to Germany, where they are sold at large profit, as the fur of the genuine "fisher." The black skins are valued the most, and during the past winter the market price has been as high as $1 per skin while mottled skins brought only 70 cents. These prices, however, have recently depreciated considerably, on account of the immense expectations. Upwards of 50,000 of these skins have been shipped from this city alone within the past two months, and in one firm in Maiden Lane here now on hand about 10,000 ready for shipment. These are designed for the Leipsic sales—Leipsic being next to Novgorod, in Russia, the most important fur entrepot in Europe. The first intimation received in this market of the value of this new description of fur came from the Hudson's Bay Company, which, having shipped a few to London at a venture, found the returns so profitable that they immediately prosecuted the business on an extensive scale, and now, so large has been the exportation, that a glut in the market is anticipated.

The heaviest collections are made in the Middle and Eastern States, in some parts of which the means for capturing these animals seems to have equalled the Western Pike's Peak gold excitement—men, women and children, are turning out en masse for the purpose; and in many instances, forsaking their regular avocations for the sake of prospective gains from the hunt. Indeed the experience of the two parents is somewhat similar, for being as enormous toward the skunk colchora as the gold diggers; for sometimes a single animal is found in a burrow, and again dirt pleasure of a dozen or twenty are discovered in a single nest, though such remunerative "hods" are not common.

In addition to the profits realized on the sale of the furs, our fur dealers also receive a considerable sum for the fat of these animals, which, we are credibly informed, is being bought at five cents per pound by a prominent druggist in Broadway, who exports them to establish the world by the introduction of a new and valuable ointment, liniment, or quassia, manufactured from this raw material. Pomade, and the pretty-smelling pubic are also expected to derive no little benefit from this wholesale slaughter of these inhabitants of the poultry [illegible] [illegible] will [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Agricultural.

Three bushels to the acre of oats is the proper quantity to sow in good soil.

Oatmeal and hay make the best food for calves.

To clear moss from fruit-trees, apply cold soap-suds with a whitewash brush. A few applications will leave the bark fresh and glossy.

For seed of any kind, save the earliest ripened and the largest. Plant these, and from the product save the earliest and largest again. In three or four years you can thus get a new variety.

Experiments, and close and careful comparison of the results of many trials, have given the following as the comparative difference between the articles mentioned and hay:

100 pounds of hay are equal to—
275 pounds of green Indian corn,
442 pounds of rye straw,
164 pounds of oat straw,
153 pounds of pea straw,
201 pounds of raw potatoes,
175 pounds of boiled potatoes,
339 pounds of mangel wurtzel,
504 pounds of turnips,
54 pounds of rye,
49 pounds of wheat,
46 pounds of oats,
45 pounds of beans or peas,
64 pounds of buckwheat,
57 pounds of Indian corn,
68 pounds of acorns,
105 pounds of wheat bran,
109 pounds of rye bran,
167 pounds of wheat, pea, and oat chaff,
179 pounds of rye and barley.

How to Raise Early Tomatoes.

About the first of April, take a few large turnips and cut out the hearts of them to form a sort of cup. Fill the cavities with earth, and plant two or three tomatoe seeds in each. When the seeds have well sprouted pull up all but the heaviest plant in each turnip, and let those that remain stand where they will have the benefit of the sun; the plants will grow very thriftily—the decaying turnips furnishing it food. When the weather becomes sufficiently warm, set the turnips in well prepared soil, not less than three feet apart. Make lath frames to keep the vines from the ground and keep the soil well hilled around them, and you will have a crop that will astonish the natives. The advantage consists in getting the plants started early without setting them back by transplanting.

REMOVAL.

Life in Lucknow.

From the special Correspondent of the London Times.

HEAD-QUARTERS BRITISH ARMY,
Near LUCKNOW, February 12.

The return given for the week ending January 29 shows that the progress of the disarmament of this porcupine province is proceeding rapidly, notwithstanding the passive resistance of the people, and the difficulties of the police in the way of procuring information. Such news as there is will be found in all the details below. It may be briefly summed up. Horsford marched into Nepaul as soon as he received General Mesfield's despatch on the morning of February 9th, and took all the guns, 13 in number, and one mortar, which the enemy left in the valley, just a few miles inside the frontier. They fired on our troops, discharged the guns, turned, fled, and escaped. Horsford is continuing his march in real or supposed concert with the columns of the Ghoorkas. John Bahadoor has issued orders that no Nepaulese subject shall leave the territory on any pretence for the present, and has suspended even religious pilgrimages. It is just possible he may at making a wide sweep of his net and catching the Nana, the Begum, Birgees Kuddr, Memoo Khan, Debee Bux of Gonda, Bainie Madhoo, and others, at one coup. Furthermore it is reported that he has commanded the Ghoorkas to refuse all aid to the rebels, and to cut off all supplies from their camps. If this be done, the Sepoys will be driven to surrender. As to Tantia Topee, there is the good news of no news. He has at last rendered himself invisible. Our Generals are all waiting anxiously for his re-appearance, as each is "sure of him this time." Even these gallant officers' forms are becoming indistinct to the gaze of the outer world. This, by latest accounts, Brigadier Bohner "is supposed to be near" Nagpore with his column; Brigadier Showers was "probably near or at Koochan," in Joudpore, to-day; Colonel Holmes has vanished "in the direction of Soojamghur; but it is hoped that some of the many columns may precipitate Tantia, now held in solution somewhere or other to the east of the Bikaneer district and jungles, and kill him. As to "dispersing his followers" the most venturesome brigadier now seems to think he will not be credited if he says the deed is done. They have been utterly dispersed so often—they have frequently thrown away their arms and hid in the jungles—nay, they have been so often reduced to starvation, which has not affected their next appearance or much diminished their numbers, that till "Tantia and his chiefs are killed or taken," I shall not be satisfied that we have put an end to his extraordinary career. As to despatches "hoping to intercept him," or to overtake him, or announcing that he and his are in hopeless plight—incredulus odi. Lord Clyde has completely recovered from the indisposition under which he suffered for a fortnight; and now seems as active and almost as well as ever. The changes of destination which have been reported, from Simla to Calcutta, had no reference to his health. The Governor General was anxious that the Commander-in-Chief should renovate his strength in the hills during the trying heats of summer, but Lord Clyde, feeling that his presence would be required at Calcutta during the discussions which must take place when the reorganization of the Indian army is under consideration, has resolved to go down and take his seat at the Board as soon as the aspect of affairs may permit of his departure from Lucknow.

The disarmament, the dismantling of forts, the collection of revenue, go on satisfactorily. When Mr. Montgomery hands over Oude to his successor there will be little left to do but to give fair play to the working of the principles and establishments he founded, and which he did not remain to develope. In consequence of the great agitation and alarm of the people along the Terai frontier it has been judged expedient to suspend the disarmament there for the present. The people were flying from their houses and villages, and in order to reassure them the police have been ordered to remain quiet for the present. This only extends to the borders of the Nepaulese kingdom, which are watched on all sides, supposing that the Ghoorkas are as active on their side as we are on ours.

The horrors of the hot winds and the positive miseries of the Indian summer are almost forgotten under the influence of such delightful weather as Lucknow enjoys at present. The only drawback to the pleasures of the breeze which sets in every morning is found in the clouds of dust, composed of powdered bricks, lime, and fine sand, which renders a single cloth tent intolerable and eyes a perpetual aggravation. If but one gentle shower would fall for a few hours we might have some comfort, but the tantalizing clouds gather overhead only to let down a few heavy drops, and then let in the sun, the power of which at noon is now so great as to make exercise on foot or horseback very disagreeable. The evenings and mornings are delightful, but the interval between the diminution of the heat of the sun and the darkness is too short for a long ride or drive. Morning and evening the whole of the main streets and roads in and about Lucknow are judiciously watered by an army of bheesties, who scatter with their heads jets of water from the mouths of their water bags (or mussucks) with the regularity of machinery. 'Society' then turns out in its buggy. It is small as yet in numbers, and a new line, particularly if it be feminine, subject to emotion. The buggy is the favorite vehicle—a sort of gig with a moveable hood; but there are phaetons, carriages, and now and then an aspiring subaltern flashes by in a genuine old Kentucky dog-cart. In the good old times it was customary to put pistols at the end of the drives, to prevent unseemly going along the course in their bitterness of party strife, and when the roads are crowded here the same manners will prevail. [illegible] of Kupperthollah's who often appears on the course with a retinue of sowars after his gig or carriage, and is the only native to be seen in society except Mcesmood Dowlah; the carriages of the various commissioners or deputy-commissioners, the buggies of the civil servants and of a few officers, and some half-dozen horsemen.—Such is our "drive." In former days I am told that Lucknow presented a very different spectacle. The streets were crowded with the processions of grandees going to Court or paying visits, each preceded by maceebearers, and surrounded by swordsmen in livery, by richly accoutred elephants bearing nobles in golden or silver howdahs, by a thronging, jostling mass of guily palanquins, belonging to merchants, bankers, officers of State and gentlemen, by continual promenades of dancing girls, of musicians, of marriage parties, of religious ceremonies—in fact, by all the outward signs of one great perpetual fete, in which the guiddy crowd swarmed, dressed, laughed, sang and lived without a thought of aught but pleasure.—The impress of that life is stamped on Lucknow yet, but it is like a masquerade attire on a corpse. The "chouk," or principal street—narrow and tortuous—is filled from two o'clock till dusk with a sweltering swarm of human beings, through whom an elephant effects his passage with difficulty; but at the same time a seat on his back affords the best mode of seeing the city. So far as I can see, the traffic which attracts this enormous crowd consists principally of sugarcandy, sweetmeats, pipestems, tobacco, rosewater, cakes, silver and gold lace, embroidered caps, and trifling finery. The shops occupy the ground-floor of the houses, which are rarely of more than two stories—the basement and one above—from which projects a wooden balcony, provided with lattices, and a broad overhanging pent for the sake of shade. On the shelving slab whereon the goods for sale are displayed sits patient and watchful "the spirited proprietor," either cross-legged or more generally in the posture which every native can assume and no European can without great pain and difficulty, namely resting on his heels with his knees at his chin. He does not assail the passers by with the importunities in which the grave Turks of Constantinople of late years have not disdained to indulge, but counting on his beads, or chatting with a neighbor, he waits for his customers. The bunnians, or shopkeepers are mostly Hindoos—a sleek fat race, with sharp glistening eyes, and all the moleskin smoothness and respectability of a bourgeoisie—dressed it snow-white tunics of the finest muslin, open so as to show the olive-colored breast at one side, shawl or scarf a round their waists, and white drawers or dhoties, which are made by drawing a piece of calico tightly round the hips, and then pulling up the ends between the legs and tucking it in at the waist. The turban is seldom worn in the streets but in lieu of it the natives put on skullcaps of very fine worked muslin, which are oftentimes richly embroidered with silks, or golden lace, and there is a great abundon affected by the younger in the angle at which the cap is perched on the head. The effect of all these white caps bedecked with lace, the dark faces, white tunics, and gay shawls, seen in endless prospective along the street is very picturesque.

The various tradesmen and shopkeepers congregate together, as in all Eastern Bazaars. Here are the money-changers with piles of rupees in bowls and baskets, who make all their money by changing rupees for small copper and shells, and [more rarely] by reversing the operation. I am not going to launch into a disquisition on Indian currency just now, but may be permitted to observe that the late Company, as a governing power greatly neglected an obvious duty to the people under their rule when they took no steps to supply a sufficient small coinage. If I wish to change a rupee for copper I must pay for it. There is always a difficulty about change in buying small articles. The copper coins of the Company are rarely to be seen here or in the towns of the North west, and little fids of copper, square and round, stamped in various native mints years ago, are in circulation to a limited extent, and form, with cowries or shells, the chief currency of the people, whose dealings are far more conversant with annas and pice than with rupees. However, here are our money-changers making money out of their money, as it is their pleasant wont to do. See, there is a little lad with a water-skin across his back, who is bargaining with one of them for some copper in exchange for a heap of cowries. He has collected these shells in the way of trade, by carrying his water-skin through the crowded streets, and announcing his presence by clinking a ring on his finger against a small metal basin, from which he gives his numerous customers a drink of pure cold water; he receives a few cowries in exchange.—There is a hard bargain going on, but the basker is inexorable. The rate of change has been fixed for the day; it is the same all along the bazaar, and capital is triumphant, as usual. Beyond the money-changers are the jewellers and workers in gold, silver, and baser metals, whose spare glitter brightly in the sun—bangles, armlets, lotos, rings, cooking dishes, buckles for belts, nose and ear-rings, and trays of gems. Then there are sellers of paan and betel nut, the dark red juice of which is spirted plentifully about the streets from the discoloured teeth and mouths of its many consumers. Next are shops full of gaudy caps and shawls, coloured enfocoes, Indian muslins, shops displaying hundreds of yards of embroidered kimkob sashes and pipe-stems; shops full of chintz, old coal now, at crockery, of dolls, of very genteel engravings of executions, from which just clouds of flies now circulating, ever flying from the hoop-tail whisks of the proprietors, of superior tobaccos and tobacconists' supplies and then. Then there are the sweet meat bakers, who carry by open frequenting four cookies, cheesecakes, custards, all of them sticky. There are old Mussuck-the shops filled with [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

THE FRENCH EMPIRE.

PARIS.—Our private letters state that the review of the army of Paris is definitively fixed for this day (Sunday.) All the regiments will be complete, every recruit having been called in. It is said that all officers in Paris on leave of absence have received orders to join their regiments.

The Patrie states that Government has decided upon adding a fourth battalion to each of the hundred infantry regiments of the line. The new battalions are to be formed out of the third and sixth companies of the already existing battalions.

Count Cavour had an audience of the Emperor, at two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. It is announced in one quarter that he leaves for Turin on Wednesday morning but one journal says that his stay here will be prolonged for two or three days more, others state that the Count will go to England.

RUSSIA.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—A letter of the 27th says:—The question of the loan has been finally settled. The house of F. M. Magnus, in Berlin, and Thompson Bonard in St. Petersburgh, have succeeded against very numerous competitors of all parts of Europe. It will be recollected that the loan was one of twelve millions sterling at 3 per cent. It has been taken at the price of 67, when the Government demanded.

Another letter states that the budget of 1859 had been presented to the Emperor by the Minister of Finance, and approved of by his Majesty without modifications. The receips, it is stated, exceed the expenses by 20½ millions of roubles.

AUSTRIA.

VIENNA.—The Emperor has addressed the following letter to the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian:—" Dear Brother, Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian,—The rapidity with which the soldiers on furlough have been recalled in the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and the manner in which they have hastened to return to their regiments, has given me the best proof of the excellent spirit with which they are animated. I, therefore, acknowledge with pleasure the activity and influence you have exercised in attaining so satisfactory a result. All those who in their respective attributions have participated in the execution of this measure have also merited my entire satisfaction. I authorize you to announce that fact publicly.—FRANCIS JOSEPH."

The Out Deutsche Post in an article in which it paints the future in gloomy colours says:—" As according to all appearances many a day will pass before the powers shall be united in the Congress, we intend to abstain for some time from publishing the reflections with which this diplomatic experiment inspires us."

PRUSSIA.

BERLIN.—The Prussian press still endeavours to show that Germany is in nowise concerned in the Italian question, which, it declares, does not affect German interest. Two Prussian journals, which have relations in Governmental circles, the Weekly Journal and the National Gazette, attack the Austro-Italian treaties as openly violating the stipulations and guarantees of the great European treaties, and they demand the abrogation of them for the sake of Italy and Europe.

Advices state that the Prussian Government intends demanding from the Chamber a credit of twelve millions of thalers, for increasing the navy and improving the defences of the coast of the Baltic and the North Sea.

BAVARIA.

MUNICH.—The ceremony of the closing of the Chambers took place on the 26th ult.

Before separating the Diet approved of all the bills which had been submitted to it. In the closing speech the Government promised to take into consideration the wishes expressed by the Chambers; and stated that the demand relating to the liberty of the press had been sent to the Council of State The speech further expressed the King's regret at the attitude taken by the Diet towards the Government. In separating, the Chambers protested their attachment to the King's person

SPAIN.

MADRID.—During a discussion in the Senate, on the 23rd ult., Gen. Calonge attacked, as illegal, certain bills voted by the Chamber of Deputies and sanctioned by the Crown; and he protested in his attacks in spite of repeated warnings from the President (General de la Concha) that it was contrary to the standing orders to question the validity of the acts of the Chamber of the Crown. General Calonge having continued his remarks the President declared that the hon. member could not be allowed to speak in such a way. General Calonge then declared that he was deprived of the liberty of speaking, and left the Senate accompanied by his political friends. The next day a vote of approval of the President's conduct was passed in the Senate by ninety-four votes to one.

ITALY.

TUSCANY.—Letters from Tuscany state that opposition is on the increase. Prince Corsini is said to have written a letter to the Grand Duke, recommending him to form an alliance with Piedmont. A modification of the Tuscan Cabinet is spoken of.

VENICE.—We learn from Venice that information had just reached that city that the colonel of a Hungarian regiment had been tried by court-martial, and sentenced to be shot at Verona, for having attempted to persuade his regiment not to fight against the Italians. The sentence, we regret to add, was immediately carried into effect.

NAPLES.—A letter from Naples of the 21st says:—" The king continues very ill, and prayers are being offered up for his recovery; he is at present at Caserta, surrounded by his family, who never leave him an instant. The Duchess of Calabria is most anxious to be in Naples, but her youthful husband has never left his father's side for one hour since his return from Bari.—Naples is perfectly tranquil, and not even anxiety for the king prevents the people from being as merry as usual. We are enjoying a grand sight at this moment, and thousands of Neapolitans fill the Villa Reale to witness it. The Grand Duke Constantine has just landed with a numerous suite, and the street fronts of his squadron has clothed the port in full colours. The small palace at Chiaramonte has been for some time past in preparation for his reception, as also some apartments in the Royal Palace. The city is full of strangers, principally Russians, notwithstanding the fabulous reports spread in Russia of our being under the ravages of a fearful epidemic—typhus. The ex-Duchess of Bedford is terror of the Neapolitan nobles, and the apartments generally shown them there, is causing a great sensation in this city."

to Schenala, and that another division will follow.

Letters assert that Count Lollemand, first secretary to the French embassy, demanded a peremptory answer from the Grand Vizier in reference to the threatening movements of troops towards the Principalities, and that the Grand Vizier gave him an evasive answer.

The Grand Vizier is very ill and his retirement is anticipated.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

The following notifications has been issued at Corfu:—

" His Excellency the Lord High Commissioner, with the concurrence of the Most Excellent the Senate, is pleased to appoint a commission, consisting of his Highness the President of the Senate; the President of the Legislative Assembly; the Secretary of the Lord High Commissioner, the Secretary of the Senate, General Department the Regent of Corfu, the Auditor General two members of the Most Noble the Legislative Assembly, to inquire into all the public departments, for the purpose of recommending such changes and improvements as can be legally carried into effect by the Government, with a view of greater efficiency and economy in the public service. His Excellency the Lord High Commissioner will preside over the Commission, which will assemble every Tuesday, Friday, and Saturday, at the Palace of St. Michael and St. George, at ten o'clock a. m. By command of his Excellency G. F. Bowen, Secretary to the Lord High Commissioner. Palace, Corfu, March 12, 1859.—P. S. The Commission will hold its first meeting on Friday next, the 18th inst., at ten a. m."

THE PENINSULAR MAIL.

The Jeddo has arrived with the Peninsular mail. She left Lisbon on the 27th ult.

The Cortes is likely to close on the 2nd of April. It is believed that the railway will be put up to public competition. Senor Fontes, it is said, will be Minister of Public Works, and Pimental will be Minister of the Interior. Prince George of Saxony is shortly expected at Lisbon to marry the Infanta. The postal convention between England and Portugal is in course of final adjustment. An ingenious plan of smuggling brandy into Lisbon has been detected. Viscount Banduera's health is better.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The steamship Dane has arrived. She left Table Bay February 21, and St. Helena February 28.

Commerce at the Cape was prosperous. Provisions were in demand. Land was advancing in value. Parliament was to meet for the dispatch of business on the 16th of March. Engineers were staking out the line of railroad from Wellington to Cape Town. A lighthouse was in course of erection on Robben Island.

The Transvaal Republicans had abandoned their designs of war against the neighboring native tribes. Intelligence from the border states and Natal was satisfactory. It was reported that the 59th Regiment, now at Cape Town, is to be ordered up to Natal in the Megæra.

The 2nd Regiment, 49th (one wing), 8th, and Cape Mounted Rifles were on the frontier. The other wing of the 45th was at Natal. 5,105 horses had been shipped for India. The Vocalist which took out emigrants, was going on with horses.

Mr. Bigley, master's-assistant of her Majesty's ship Triton, Lieut. Commander Barton, entered St. Helena on Sunday the 27th of Feb., in charge of a brigantine, name unknown, captured off Killongu, on the west coast of Africa. The Triton was at anchor when the brigantine was first discovered standing in shore; he altered her course immediately, and took to sea. The Triton got up steam, and chasing all night, came up with her at seven a. m. No colours were exhibited or papers produced. She was fully equipped for the slave trade, and had on board dollars to the value of £800. Her captain came passenger, but was not likely to oppose condemnation.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF WATERFORD.

The following account of this melancholy catastrophe is supplied by the Kilkenny Moderator of Wednesday:—

This melancholy accident took place on Tuesday afternoon, while his lordship was hunting with his hounds. The meet was at Castle-Morris, county of Kilkenny, and more than one hunt had taken place, when at Corbally, midway between Castle-Morris and Carrick-on-Suir, in leaping a small fence, half bank, half wall, not much more than two feet high, the marquis's horse missed its hind legs on the bank and dropped its fore-legs into a small cut on the other side, which threw the animal on its knees, so that his lordship was thrown off on his head, apparently without much force or violence. He lay on his face, his hunting-cap having a cut in the top, but there was no cut or bruise on the head. On being lifted up he was placed in a sitting position, but was entirely unconscious, and never after spoke. He lived about ten minutes, and the only sign of life given was that he drew up one leg and sighed. Immediately after this, however, Dr. O'Ryan of Carrick-on-Suir, who had been engaged in the hunt, and was immediately in attendance, pronounced life had become extinct. Death resulted from concussion of the brain. The noble marquis dying without any issue, his vast estates descend to his brother, the Rev. Lord John Beresford, who holds a large living in the archdiocese of Armagh."

WAS IT NOAH'S ARK?

Antiquarians and geologists and naturalists answer the question we have put above to accompany the following fact, if you can:—

" A few days ago, as two colliers were working coal in a pit in the neighborhood of Bathgate, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, they were astounded, on breaking a large piece of coal, to see a living frog skip nimbly from it. The niche in which it had lived was perfectly smooth, and of the exact shape of the frog. The hind legs of the animal are at least twice as long as those of an ordinary frog, the forelegs almost gone. It is of a beautiful bronze colour. It leaped briskly about the moment that it was liberated from its dark abode. How many generations it may have been shut up from light and air it is impossible to say; certain it is although destitutive in form, and with great brilliancy of eye, it is a very unattractive looking customer. It inspires us with the kind of fear to be brought into contact with a living being that has in all probability, breathed the same air as Noah, or departed in the same limpid stream in which Adam bathed his sturdy limbs."

THE DOGS OF THE WORLD.

The North British Review discovering on the dogs of the world, has the following remarks:—What the change is to be we dare not even conjecture, but we cannot help thinking that some considerable modification in the character and habits of this power, the happiness of human existence, of manners, almost upon the globe—the striking events of which have attended at the latter end—the sudden eruption of our own satellite—the appearance of new stars and disappearance of others, are all foreshadows of that impending convulsion to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is up by burglar-up, and under heavens which seem to let rain away at them raining, as it were, on the cemetery-and dwelling upon the mausoleums of former worlds, let us learn the lessons of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of revelation.

Dissolution of the Union.

From the Parliamentary reports which will be found in another column, it will be seen that in the House of Assembly, on Monday last, our Representative, Mr. Short, presented a petition from certain of the inhabitants of the County of Peterborough, praying for a dissolution of the Union. This subject, as all will admit, is one by no means unimportant. Being of such moment it deserves serious consideration, and therefore a hasty conclusion should not be arrived at concerning it.—Holding as we do the same opinion as the petition referred to, it appears to us that a dissolution of the union would be much preferable to the deplorable state of things at present existing. We should be the last, however, to advocate such an issue if the Government of the country were carried on as it ought to be—justice and equality shown as well to Upper, as to Lower Canada. But since this is far from being the case we are decidedly of opinion that it would be more advantageous to the former if the Union should be dissolved.

It is sad to think of the reckless way in which the present Ministry conduct the affairs of the country. Who does not see how the money of the Province is squandered away in the most unscrupulous and unprincipled manner, and that they are enabled to do this by the votes of the Lower Canadians, by which also they are kept in office? Many of their transactions abundantly prove what is thus affirmed concerning them. In not their conduct in connection with the Seigniorial Tenure business amply sufficient to convince every mind open to conviction, that they are utterly unworthy of the confidence of Upper Canada. It is high time for the country to be aroused to a sense of its present position, and speak out in a manner that will be unmistakeable to all, against the gross wrongs which are being constantly perpetrated upon it. If the present system of carrying on its government be much longer persisted in, is there not reason to fear that the Province will be plunged into bankruptcy? Is it not then the bounden duty of every patriot who wishes to see his country's prosperity promoted and maintained to do what he can consistent with the constitution to prevent so deplorable an end?

We find amongst the recently published list of "Patents for Inventions," the following:—

Aldus Mowry, of the village of Ashburnham, county Peterborough, machinist, for "a Chop Grinder."—Dated March, 1859.

The Lecture this evening before the Mechanics' Institution will be delivered by Rev. Mr. Douglas—Subject 'Education.'

The next Lecture of the course will be delivered by Mr. Conneby, Subject, "Ups and Downs of Life." This gentleman comes highly recommended by the press in every place where he has delivered his celebrated lecture. We extract the following from the Kingston Whig:—

THE UPS AND DOWNS OF LIFE.—Mr. Connolly's Lecture last evening was attended by an appreciating audience. His thrilling portraiture of the "Ups and Downs of Life" were listened to with breathless interest and the equally telling delineations of life in the upper spheres of society met with animated applause. As an eloquent speaker and rhetorician he has created a favorable impression in this city; and his lecture in point of language and delivery was of a finished and elevated character. The encomiums bestowed upon this gentleman by the American Press have been earned by him in Kingston without detraction, and his dramatic readings, with which the lecture is interspersed, fully merit all that we have seen in print respecting them.

Mr. COUTER having procured the prescription for Dr. McKeon's Worm Powder, is, we understand now prepared to dispense it at 1s 3d per package.

It has been so often found in private practice to be productive of the desired effect, that it can be safely recommended in all cases of "Worms" or affections bearing a general resemblance to "Worms." It is very gentle in its action and will be found useful in correcting all derangements of the intestines, and consequently in obviating the many diseases originating in a weakened or debilitated condition of the alimentary passage.

Town Council.

SATURDAY, April 23.

The Council met in special session on Saturday night. Present—His Worship the Mayor; Messrs Heathers, White, Foulis, Hubbard, Bland, Kennedy, Hogan and Jackson.

The object of the meeting was to draft a memorial to the Legislature to protect the rights of the Bidwell Islands from the operations of the Bill before Parliament for the relief of the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway.

The Memorial was read in Council but as the Mayor and Aldermen were not present the matter was deferred until Monday evening.

Hon. Col. PRINCE will be entertained by the Mayor and Aldermen of this city this evening at the Albion Hotel.

sale of the rolling stock, advertised to take place on the 26th inst., and that said sale had not come off. The following is a copy of the memorial sent to the Legislature:—

To the Honourable the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada:

THE MEMORIAL OF THE TOWN OF PETERBOROUGH,

HUMBLY SHEWETH,—

Whereas, by a mutual understanding between the Municipalities of the Towns of Port Hope and Peterborough, it was agreed between them to provide the sum of Forty thousand Pounds currency for the purpose of constructing a railway from the Town of Peterborough to Millbrook as a feeder to the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway, especially for the accommodation and convenience of the Town of Peterborough.

And Whereas, the Town of Peterboro' did provide the sum of Thirty Thousand Pounds, part of the said sum of Forty Thousand Pounds, and pay it over to the contractor and lessee, according to the condition of the right of way granted by the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company to John Fowler at a nominal rent of five dollars per annum in perpetuity.

And Whereas, it was specially agreed upon between the said Municipalities, the said Railway Company, the said John Fowler, and the mortgagees of the said Company, as Trustees for the original Bond-holders, that the said intended line of Railway should be free and unincumbered by the original mortgage then existing upon the main line. And that the lessee should pay to the said Municipalities respectively interest upon their respective advances, and secure such payment by an assignment of the lease.

And Whereas, your Petitioners regard the said line of railroad to Millbrook as aforesaid as an independent line, subject to the conditions of the lease securing to your petitioners indemnity against loss upon their subscription.

And Whereas, the said new line or feeder is not embarrassed or requiring pecuniary aid, and is held in trust for the better securing the interest of your petitioners free and unincumbered.

Your petitioners humbly pray that it may please your Honourable House not to pass the Bill now before your Honourable House for which no motion was given, or any Bill intended as a relief to the said Company, that infringes upon the private rights of the said John Fowler as guaranteed to him in his said lease, or that will prejudice the security guaranteed to your petitioners.

Arrival of the "City of Washington."

New York, April 25.

The steamship, City of Washington, with Liverpool advices to the 13th, arrived at this port this afternoon. Her dates are three days later. Since the sailing of the last steamer, the war rumors have circulated to an alarming extent, but the latest reported are of a more pacific nature. The armament preparations continue with unabated vigor.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.

April 12.

Breadstuffs firm and higher; provisions advancing.

April 13—Beef buoyant. There is a large speculative feeling, and holders demand an advance of 2½d. a 5d. Pork quiet; holders demand higher prices. Bacon quiet. Lard dull.

Sugar quiet. Rice quiet. Coffee quiet. Rosin dull. Spirits of turpentine firm at 42s.

LATEST.

London, April 13, a. m.

Consols are firmly held at 95¼; money continues without change. There is a good demand for American securities.—Market closed quiet, but steady.

STATE OF TRADE.

Manchester advices are not favorable; markets being generally quiet, but steady.

Provincial Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

WEDNESDAY, April 20, 1859.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three p. m.

DURHAM AND NORTHUMBERLAND.

Hon. Mr. CRAWFORD moved the second reading of the bill from the Legislative Assembly, for the separation of the Counties of Durham and Northumberland.

Hon. Mr. PERRY opposed the bill, as if the people most deeply interested in the question were in favor of a separation they could take advantage of a general law for the separation of counties. There were no petitions, so far as he understood, in favour of this bill. But there were several petitions from the municipalities against it. He would not say whether the counties should separate, or not, or whether it would be more convenient for the junior county—the County of Durham—to be separated. He took the broad ground that there was a general law, of which, if they choose, they could take advantage. He would, therefore, move that the bill be read a second time this day three months.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON opposed the bill at some length. He said it had been stated by the hon. gentleman opposite that he was desirous of Bowmanville being the County Town. He would say it was not so. If this bill was passed it would entail greater burdens upon the people, and for this reason he was opposed to it. The parties interested in this bill were partially connected with the Village of Newcastle. This village wants to be the Seat of Government of this county, and a certain number of persons there expected to get offices in connection with the division. If this bill were passed it would set the people of Bowmanville and Newcastle and Port Hope to work to see who could buy up most votes, and his opinion was that those who bid highest would get the most. He was sure the legislature did not desire to put them in that position, and he hoped therefore that they would not do so by passing this bill.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON thought the people generally were in favor of separation, but they desire that it should take place in a proper and satisfactory manner. The Municipal Bill provided very wisely for such separations, but this bill was thought desirable and he therefore would support it.

Hon. Mr. DEBLEURAY wished to know from his hon. friend if there was any thing in the general measure to prevent them from separating.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON I merely have to say, it might be connected with other measures to-day, but that is all. (Hear, hear.)

Hon. Mr. PATTON opposed the bill.—The whole burdens of the people. At this moment such a thing could not be considered. If there was any great hardship to be provided for it would be different. But it did not even provide for the County Town although it was named. These counties are not in a position to incur fresh liabilities. The Town of Port Hope borrowed from the Municipal Loan Fund $880,000, and is at this moment in arrears for interest to the amount of $238,000. The Counties of Northumberland and Durham borrowed $460,000, and is in arrears to the extent of $42,927, while the town of Cobourg has borrowed $500,000, and is in arrears for interest $171,000. How then could they pass this bill to impose fresh burdens upon these municipalities?

The motion in amendment was then put and carried, by a vote of 29 to 12.

The bill was accordingly lost.

PORT HOPE AND LINDSAY RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. SEYMOUR moved the second reading of the bill (from the Legislative Assembly) for incorporating the Port Hope Lindsay and Beaverton Railway.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON considered the bill a very strange one. He would not oppose its second reading, but if it was not sent to a committee that would investigate the matter thoroughly, he would oppose it at every stage.

The bill was then read a second time and referred to committee.

The SPEAKER stated that a message had been received from the Legislative Assembly entitled an Act for the relief of the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company. Also an Act to enable the Rector of the first parsonage or rectory within the Township of Drummond, in the County of Lanark, and the Churchwardens thereof, with the consent of the Bishop, to raise a loan on certain Church property for the purpose of furnishing the Church thereof.

Hon. Mr. CRAWFORD moved the second reading of the bill to relieve the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway.

The SPEAKER said the rule had not been complied with.

Hon. Mr. CRAWFORD moved the suspension of the 49th rule.

A little discussion ensued, but the bill was subsequently read a second time.

The House then adjourned until Saturday at eleven o'clock.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

MONDAY, April 25.

The Speaker took the chair at eleven o'clock.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. SHORT and Mr. DUNKIN presented petitions for the passing of a Prohibitory Liquor Law.

DISSOLUTION OF THE UNION.

Mr. SHORT presented a petition from certain of the inhabitants of the County of Peterboro', praying for a Dissolution of the Union. It was as follows:—" Your petitioners cannot but view with alarm the present state of legislation, whereby laws are forced upon Upper Canada by Lower Canadian majorities, though Upper Canada is compelled to pay more than an equal proportion of the taxes that may be necessary for the support of the government; nor do your petitioners believe that representation based upon population, though it might mend matters, would effectually remedy the evil complained of, as it should have the effect of restraining the state of things. Your petitioners would be far from wishing to see Lower Canadians having cause to make a similar complaint against Upper Canada. Therefore your petitioners are firmly persuaded that the Union of the Provinces, as constituted, will never give mutual satisfaction, and humbly pray that your honorable House may take immediate steps to repeal the Union (cheers and cries of "carried!") and not proceed with the erection of Government buildings at Ottawa." (Hear, hear.)

Atty. Gen. CARTER—The petition is too short! Yock! Yock! Yock! (Laughter.)

TUESDAY, April 26.

PETERBOROUGH BY-LAW.

The Bill to legalize by-law, number 137, of the United Counties of Peterborough and Victoria, for raising a certain sum of money therein mentioned, was read a second time.

The Bill to revise and amend the act incorporating the Cobourg Manufacturing Company, was read a second time.

DESTRUCTIVE ENGINES OF WAR.

Dr. Dionysius Lardner says, in a letter to the Times, published yesterday:—" Compounds are known in chemistry which when exposed to the air spontaneously ignite diffusing through the surrounding atmosphere gases or vapours, so insufferable that men forced to respire them would be rendered utterly incapable of all effectual action. Shells charged with such compounds, exploding in the gun room of a vessel, anywhere between her decks, would without destroying life or limb, disable the enemy. Compounds having such properties are very numerous. But there are others of a much more formidable character which chemistry can really supply. There are certain compounds called in chemistry by the not very euphonious name 'kakodyles,' of which arsenic is one of the constituents, which, on exploding, not only diffuse exhalations which render the surrounding atmosphere so fetid as to be absolutely insufferable in respiration, but impart to it also qualities which are poisonous in the most deadly degree. The compounds being eminently volatile, explode spontaneously when exposed to the air. In burning the metallic arsenic, one of their constituents, combining with the oxygen of the air, forms fumes of white arsenic, which being diffused through the surrounding air, kills all who breathe it. What the effect of shells charged with such compounds would be, bursting in a ship, or within a besieged fort, or in the midst of closely-packed ranks, need not be described. The chemist can supply many compounds having these properties in different degrees. But the laboratory can furnish agents still more destructive. There are compounds into which the gas called cyanogen enters in combination with arsenic. A shell charged with such a compound upon exploding would produce terrible effects. The humidity with which the surrounding air is always more or less charged would be decomposed; its oxygen, combining with the arsenic, would form the vapour of arsenious acid, which is the substance commonly called arsenic, and known as a deadly poison, while the hydrogen, the other constituent of the decomposed moisture, combining with the cyanogen, would form the still more fearful poison called by chemists hydrocyanic acid, but more familiarly known to the public as prussic acid. Thus by the explosion of such a shell, the surrounding air would be instantly impregnated with the vapors of one of the most fearful poisons known to science."

AFFECTING SCENE.

After a trial occupying eighteen days, Stephens has been found, by a New York jury, guilty of poisoning his wife. The Express says of the verdict—" The jurors retired and spectators dispersed, and the sheriff with his deputies approached the prisoner." His little girl, Bella, turned towards Stephens, and after kissing him said, "Come, pa! let us go now, it is all over; see, pa! the people are going."—" Human nature," says the Express, 'could not stand this; the sheriff turned away to hide a tear, and retired. Such an affecting scene has rarely been witnessed."

HOMELY TRUTHS FOR WIVES.

Although your husband may neglect to give you a good dress, do not seek revenge by giving him a good dressing. Do not hesitate between the choice of an expensive mantle and your husband's affections; the former may be dear to your back, but the latter should be dear to your bosom.——Should your husband bring a friend home to partake of the remains of yesterday's hash, do not be churlish, but lift a warm smile across the cold repast. HAVELOCK'S GRAVE.

I wish I could say to the people of England, who honoured Havelock so deeply, that the grave of their chosen one is worthily marked, or that its proper inscription is worthy of the sentiments which fill their, or of the country. When I visited the Alumbagh, where my friend Havelock was hurriedly interred in the month of the sickliest season, I found his grave in a garden, which, though it had been planted by himself, was already overgrown with jungle. The spot was not marked by any stone, but a few bricks had been placed at the head and foot of the grave, and on the latter was scratched with a bayonet the letter "H." Such was the grave—and just over it, rudely carved by a soldier's hand on the trunk of a tree, could be traced the letter "P." And this is the grave and the inscription of Sir Henry Havelock!—Times' special correspondent.

Farming Prospects.

Though we do not multiply citations, it is certain that winter grain is generally looking well throughout the country—much better than the open broken character of the last winter gave reason to hope.—There may be local exceptions, but the present prospects for a good yield of both wheat and rye are excellent, while the frequent freezings and thawings of the ground since last November must have proved widely fatal to the eggs and larvæ of insects We confidently hope for heavy crops of winter grain this year.

But it must be considered that the general yield of grain last year was a very light one throughout the Free States.—Wheat did well in the south, as did Indian corn in the north; but the great west—the granary of America, and to some extent of Europe also—had a lighter yield per cultivated acre than ever before. We estimate the wheat crop of the entire Union at less than ten bushels per acre, and that of the Free States at less than eight bushels.—Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota had the best of it; but even they did not average a middling crop of oats. Hardly a third of a crop was realized throughout the country—in the west, hardly more than was sown. Indian Corn better—in the north, very well; in the south, middling well; in the west, there was rather more than half a crop, but not much more. Iowa had probably less; Illinois and Indiana, not much more; Ohio, at best a light yield.—The aggregate deficiency in the grain-harvest of 1858 must be estimated by hundreds of millions of bushels.

We say, therefore, to the few who have made the inquiry, and to whoever may think our opinion worth hearing. There is a positive and signal deficiency of grain in the country at this moment, and you can hardly sow and plant too much. We do not mean that any man should plant or sow twenty acres, when he has only help, team and fertilizers to cultivate ten thoroughly; but we do say, put in the crops; put them in well, and as large an area as you can fully take care of. There is a great European war looming on the horizon—it may or may not break out this year, but all the craft of diplomacy, all the pleadings of Christianity, cannot prevent it. The war will create an immense demand for our provisions; but even were it to be ultimately arrested, the immense preparations of the prospective belligerents, their manœuvres, marchings, and concentrations of troops; their diversion of skill and labor from productive industry to fortification, cannon-casting, the rifling of muskets, the manufacture of powder, &c., must create an extra demand for food. And not only is there much less grain now in the country than usually at this season, but we hear complaints from various quarters of the scarcity of fodder also—caused in part doubtless, by the deficient grain harvest last year. Let the husbandmen prepare, therefore, to double in '59 his grain crops of '58 in the confident assurance that the fruits of his labor will command a liberal recompense —N. Y. Tribune.

The Explosion at Hounslow.

SEVEN LIVES LOST.

From the Times.

The Hounslow Powder Mills are the oldest establishment of the kind in England. The works are situated in the parish of Twickenham upon a plot of ground measuring nearly 100 acres in extent, and the various buildings are constructed on the most approved principles for the prevention of accident, embankments and watercourses intersecting the land in every direction, and thick groves of trees being planted between the mills, for the purpose of checking concussion, in the event of accident occurring in any one of them. The works include charcoal, saltpetre, and brimstone mills, dusting-houses, and other departments necessary for the production of powder of various degrees of fineness. The explosion of yesterday though fatal in so many cases, was fortunately confined to a limited portion of the works, only one press-house and corning mill having been destroyed. Though none remained to tell the tale, it is confidently believed the presshouse exploded first, and that the concussion from it fired the corning-mill. Not a vestige remains of either of these buildings. The massive machinery contained in both of them has been scattered by the force of the explosion to a distance of several hundred yards in every direction. The trees which separated these buildings have been uprooted, and their branches destroyed, and a solid earthen embankment, 12 feet high, which had been thrown up between them, is levelled with the ground. There were four poor fellows working in the press-house when the accident occurred. Here their occupation was less hazardous than in some other processes of the manufacture, and it is not easy to divine what can have occasioned the disaster. All these men were blown to atoms, and of three others who were at work in the corning-mill only one survived in an insensible condition for a short time. The painful nature of the catastrophe was greatly increased at this moment by the arrival of many of the wives and children of men employed upon the works, all anxious to ascertain the safety of their relatives. Mr. Ashby the manager, was on the spot, and used his best endeavors to calm the excited feelings of the multitude, in which he was assisted by the medical gentlemen present; but the grief and anxiety which prevailed was terrible to witness. As soon as practicable the mortar-roof of the workmen was called over when six were missing; and a man named Stephen May, was found at some distance from the corning-house in an insensible condition, in which state he remained until death released him from his sufferings shortly afterwards. All these seven unfortunate men were married. Many has left a large family of young children, and the wife of another is daily expecting her confinement.

Organs.—Their History.

THERE is no instrument to compare with the organ, either for its vast compass, or for the power with which it impresses, or for the solemn swelling sounds, or its ineffable sweetness, scarcely audible in the floating whisperings of the vaulted roof, save alike our deepest feelings. We feel exalted in our hearts whenever and wherever its myriad voices are heard. May wonder, then, that inventive genious and creating skill have been for supporting at work to perfect this sublime "king of wind-instruments," as the reformer Knox complimentarily termed it; and that, upon which the world, with each other to produce a chief d'œuvre of this description. We cannot make a history of the organ here—perhaps it is not necessary that we should do so, but we can glance at it, and we may mention, in connection with this subject the proportions of several organs.—The largest organ on the continent is that at Haerlem. Its height is 108 feet, and width 50. It contains 5,000 pipes, resembling columns of silver, rising from the ground to the roof. A tone of thunder rolls round the building when its full power is put on. The organ at the New Church Amsterdam, has 32 whole stops, besides half stops; and two rows of keys for the feet and three for the fingers, together with a set of pipes which imitate the human voice.

The great organ now placed in the orchestra of the Crystal Palace, was built especially for the Festival by Messrs. Gray and Davison, the eminent manufacturers, and is of colossal proportions and unprecedented power. Some idea may be entertained of its magnitude when it is stated that it stands on more ground than is allotted to most ordinary houses, its width being 40 feet, its depth 20. The organ, therefore, covers a quarters of 1200 feet.—It contains 4570 sounding pipes, ranging in size from 32 feet in length, with a diameter sufficient to admit easily the passage of a man's body, to less than one inch in length, with the bore of no ordinary spell. In order to place these 4510 pipes efficiently at the performers disposal, at least 4000 other separate working parts are necessary, many of these being complete machines in themselves, and the entire mass weighs 30 tons. There are four complete sets of keys in the Festival organ, each one having a compass of 56 notes, and commanding a distinct department. The necessary motive power is supplied and distributed by the agency of hydraulic machinery, and the whole is arranged so that the performer, seated at one of the keyboards, may command the entire power of the instrument, or any portion of it, at pleasure, without being merely an assistant to the terminating and regulating the pressure at which it is delivered to the various wind-chests. At present the bellows are worked by 10 blowers, but when the organ is completed, hydraulic engines will be used with pressure obtained from the water-towers.—The aim of the builders had been to produce an instrument, the varied qualities of which should combine all desirable musical beauty with force and grandeur of tone sufficient to qualify it for the part it was destined to bear in the great Handel Commemoration. In this they have succeeded to admiration. They have produced an instrument, so far as we know, unparalleled for power and volume of sound, and certainly unapproached by any organ with which we are acquainted for beauty, capability, and variety of tone. In a word the Great Festival Organ reflects the highest possible credit on the ingenuity, perseverance, intrepidity, and talent of the constructors; and will long remain as one of the proudest monuments of the mechanical spirit and skill as applied to the fine arts.

Frightful Shipwreck and Butchery of 200 Persons.

Dispatches received from Australia put us in possession of the particulars of a frightful shipwreck and butchery of the crew and passengers. A number of chinese men women, and children sailed from Hong Kong for Sydney, New South Wales, some few months ago. Their number is stated to have been 327, and they shipped themselves as passengers. Their object doubtless, was to reach those gold diggings where so many of their compatriots had realised a fair amount of profit for the labour they had bestowed. They proceeded fairly upon their journey until the 29th of September, when a squall arose, and the vessel was eventually driven slightly out of her course, and, notwithstanding the efforts of the commander, Captain Pennard, totally wrecked on the island of Rossel, in the South Pacific, about 500 miles from New Zealand, on the night of the 30th of September last. The means of communication between the crew and the Chinese passengers were limited in their nature. They thoroughly understood, through the medium of a Chinese interpreter, the terms of the agreement into which they had entered, to be conveyed to Sydney, but for other purposes their means of intercourse failed. It was with the greatest difficulty that Captain Pennard was enabled to get his shipwrecked passengers on shore, little thinking, as he endeavoured to do so, the horrible death that was in store for them. As far as it was possible under the circumstances, the necessary provision was made for the comparative comfort of all, and Captain Pennard and eight of his crew left the island in one of the ships boats, to endeavour to obtain assistance from any vessel they might fall in with, and so relieve the Chinese passengers from the sad position in which they were placed. These nine heroic men are stated to have undergone the severest privations, and it was not until the 15th of October, having started on their mission of the 30th September preceding, that they were picked up by the Prince of Denmark, schooner, and conveyed to the French settlement of New Caledonia, where they were received with the greatest kindness. The authorities immediately dispatched the French steamer Styx to ascertain the fate of the chinese left on the island and the vessel arrived there on the 8th January last. The result of the inquiry reached sydney on the 25th January, and was to the effect that the whole of the passengers and the remainder of the crew had been killed by the natives, with the exception of one Chinese, who having been accidently spared, was rescued by the crew of the steamer.

This Chinese passenger arrived on Tuesday, and has furnished us [a Sydney paper] with the following account of the massacre:

—"The ship went on shore during the night and when she struck the passengers all rushed on deck, making a great outcry, upon which the captain drove them all below again. When daylight broke, we landed by means of the boats on an island, where we remained two days without any water, when some of us went on board the ship again to get some, as also provisions. The captain left in his boat with some of the crew, and we were not disturbed by the natives for a month after he was gone; they then came over from the mainland, distant about three-quarters of a mile, and made an attack on us. Some of us had double-barrelled carbines, but we got frightened, and threw them away. The only white man left with us after the departure of Captain Pennard, was a Greek, who, having armed himself with a cutlas, fought desperately, and killed a great many of the natives before he was overpowered. They then took all our clothing, &c., which they partly destroyed. Any valuables that they found, such as sovereigns, rings, &c., they placed in a net bag, which each man carried round his neck. A watch particularly excited their attention, as they were continually opening it to observe the reflection of their faces in the glass. At night we were placed in the centre of a clear piece of ground, and fires lit in several places, the natives keeping a regular watch over us, and during the day they would select four or five Chinese, and after killing them, roast the flesh, and eat it; what was not consumed being deposited in their nets. Their mode of proceeding was as follows:—The victims being decided on, they were taken out, and beaten all over (excepting the head) with a kind of club, and then dispatched by ripping the stomach open.—The body was then cut up in small peices and devided, the fingers, toes, and brains eagerly sought after; the bones were then collected, and either burnt or thrown away. I saw ten of my fellow passengers killed in this way. On one occasion some of the Chinese took a boat which belonged to the ship, and went over to the mainland at night to get some water, but never returned, so we thought they had been killed. Every day they brought us cocoa-nuts or some wild roots to eat, and appeared to be quite friendly with us. This state of things continued until I was taken off the island. When I left there were only four Chinese and the Greek alive, all the rest having been killed. I saw these five the day the steamer came in sight, but when the natives saw the boats coming on shore they took them to the mountains. I was sick and lame and they would not carry me so that I watched my opportunity and contrived to conceal myself among the rocks until the boat came on shore. They are very ingenious, but do not appear to have any chiefs among them. They live on cocoa-nuts, of which there are large quantities, and a kind of yam, which they roast before eating; but beyond a few dogs, I saw neither animals nor fowls of any kind.

Golden Rule.—Great men stand like solitary towers in the city of God; small men, like the dwellings in the valley, are subject to the influence of the moment. Great souls, like the towers on the hill-tops, catch the first beams of the morning sun, and reflect them to the valleys below, while the little souls in the valley do not dream of the coming day.

If you wish to get on, shun what you hear to be the ruling passion of the day. Whatever is popular is generally wrong. Do not follow the crowd, but quietly pursue your own course.

CANADIAN NEWS.

Hamilton boasts an electro-plating establishment, where all kind of goods, both old and new, are plated in good style. The process is highly interesting, yet very simple; the metal being held in solution and the article suspended in it, till such a thickness of the metal as is desirable, is made to adhere to it by galvanic influence. Mr. McEwen will show it to any one who is curious enough to call on him.

Rock was tried for the murder of Dickey yesterday, found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged on Monday, 13th June next.—Belleville Intelligencer.

On Monday forenoon three young men left one of the wharves to enjoy a sail over the bay in a skiff. A sudden gust of wind upset the boat, and the whole party were thrown out. One of the number sank, and his body has not been recovered at the time we write. His name was Murphy, and his mother keeps a saloon on John Street. —Hamilton Times.

A Fright in Church.

On Sunday last, as [the service at St. Paul's Church was commencing, one of the galleries slightly gave way, with a loud noise in consequence of some work having been commenced under it and left incomplete.—The consternation and confusion among the congregation became indescribable. There was a general rush to the door. There was crushing but no one was hurt. There were some cases of fainting. The service broke up, and was not resumed that day. —Montreal Gazette.

Arrival of Governor Hincks.

His Excellency Governor Hincks arrived in this city, on Thursday evening by the ten o'clock train from Toronto. He was welcomed at the station by a number of his friends. On the way up, especially at Woodstock and Ingersoll, the train, while passing, was loudly cheered by a number of his admirers. While in London, he remains the guest of Jno. F. Harris, Esq.—Yesterday afternoon, a deputation from St. Thomas met the honourable gentleman at the Tecumseh Hotel, and presented him with an address of welcome, to which he returned a suitable reply.—London Prototype.

The Murder near Guelph.

Information has reached this city of the arrest of McCaffrey for the murder of his wife, near Guelph. The accused has confessed his guilt, but denies that he killed her with an axe. He states that he and deceased quarrelled in the bush, about some trifling matter, and that he knocked her down by striking her with a cordwood stick. The man was taken into custody near Puslinch on Sunday morning. The party arrested by the police here on suspicion, has of course, been discharged.—Hamilton Times.

An Unnatural Mother.

On the evening of Sunday about nine o'clock, a female child between three and four months old, was found on the Kingston road by a woman named Mrs. Newberry, who lives opposite Mr. Clark's tavern. The child has black hair and eyes, and was dressed in plain white clothes, and carefully wrapped up in a bed quilt. Mrs. Newberry tended the unprotected innocent with much care, and gave it shelter for the night. On Monday she informed the police of the circumstance, and they are endeavouring to ferret out the unnatural mother. Mrs. Newberry has still the care of the infant.

Canadian Trade in Boston.

The Boston Commercial Bulletin says: "The amount of business transacted between Boston and Canada has been much larger this Spring than in any previous season. Not only have the Canadian merchants given practical evidence of a desire to increase their commercial relations with Boston, but from recent developments, and through the active cooperation of certain parties here, our merchants have manifested an equally strong desire to afford the necessary facilities for consummating so desirable an object. We understand two cargoes of tea have already been ordered to Boston—one to arrive in the Fall, and one in the Spring following."

Destructive Fire in Windsor.

The Evening Tribune of April 25, gives the following account of a destructive fire which occurred the day previous at Windsor:—

About half-past 3 o'clock yesterday morning, our citizens were startled by the alarm of fire, and it was soon discovered that a terrific conflagration was raging in the repairing shop and contiguous buildings belonging to the Great Western Railway, in Windsor. Our firemen speedily rallied, Nos. 3, 5 and 6, accompanied by chief engineer Lee, repaired to the Milwaukee dock, where the steamer Windsor was lying, and were over the river within about half an hour from the first alarm.—But for the necessary delay attending getting up of steam, they could have reached the opposite side sooner. Upon arriving at the scene of the conflagration it was found that the repairing shop was already in ruins, together with its valuable contents, consisting of four locomotives and tenders, together with a large amount of valuable machinery and tools pertaining to the shop. It was a large frame structure situated nearly a quarter of a mile east of the station, the wood-shed being about twenty feet from it on the north. The blacksmiths' shop was located some twenty-five or thirty feet from the east end of the repairing shop. The wood-pile was about 500 feet in length, and consisted of probably not less than 1500 cords of fine seasoned wood. This soon became an immense mass of flame, and its destruction would be likely to involve the burning of the freight-house further onward, which contained a number of locomotives, the efforts of the firemen were directed to reducing the flames, the latter to effect which several branches were made in different portions of the pile. After the vigorous exertions on the part of the firemen, the desired result was accomplished. The fire was discovered by the watchman while patrolling from one end of the freight shed to the other. The flame burst out from the roof, and he describes them as shooting up like a rocket. In less than thirty minutes the roof fell in. The woodshed caught fire next, and almost at the same instant the flames were communicated to the blacksmith shop which was soon destroyed. Those connected with the road attribute the catastrophe to incendiarism, a gang of whom have been prowling around for some time past. A few nights previous they broke into a store-house and broke open the safe in the value of nearly $200. Four men had been at work all night in the repairing shops, which in connection with the fact of the watchman being absent on an errand, throws great darkness on the subject. [The fire originated] in the repairing shop and [was]

Agricultural.

In grafting, remember that the main point lies in the inner bark of the stock coming in close contact with that of the graft.

Grasshoppers are pretty fairly destroyed by dusting the plants infested with tobacco dust, and repeated when the bark, the most hurtful insect attack it by dusting the bugs with the same effect.

A Boston correspondent assures us that a great advantage is to be gained by running the plow deeper for Oats and Winter Wheat than for corn.

The Rochester potato is pronounced unrivaled and safe for market by the American Agriculturist.

There is no time like the present for planting fruit-trees.

If no quinces is planted in the hill with melons, cucumbers, or other vines, it will protect them from the striped bug.

To seed down lands for meadows, sow timothy in Autumn, on wheat or rye, or on the rolled fallow. Brush in and roll. A bushel of good seed may be made to cover four acres.

A correspondent of the Rural American believes lime to be injurious to the best wheat crop.

From twelve to fourteen pounds of good seed per acre is quite sufficient on all good clover land, and in a good state for its growth.

It is better to plow in your oats, than to plow first and then harrow them in.

Frost visits from the limbs and upper parts of the tree always last the longest.

A correspondent tells us that he has been successful in preserving eggs by putting them in a brine composed in the proportion of one pint of salt, one pint of quicklime and three gallons of water. Try it!

THE OLD MAID.

Mamma, I do wonder," said Mary Arlington, "what you see in Miss Lucy Fisher to like so much. You seem to prefer her to more agreeable people. It does seem strange. Why, the other day when the Stanleys called with their carriage and outriders, you were engaged; but the moment the maid, "Miss Fisher is below marm," you rushed to meet her as you would to have seen papa had he been gone a month. Then she must always have the most luxurious chair, the best room, the most comfortable corner—the nicest bit of the greatest rarity on the table. Pardon me, dear mother, if I speak too strongly, for I do feel so puzzled about it. Why, Miss Fisher seems to me nothing but a little, bombic old maid, pitted with the small pox, without much conversation. 'There is a mystery about it."

"My dear child, I will unravel the mystery and then if you do not agree with me in thinking that Miss Fisher ought to share the best we have, I shall blush for you.

"Miss Fisher's father and mine were near neighbours. We both lived in a sweet rural village—where the din of the factory and steam engine were never heard. A clear river half embraced it in its silver arms. Blue mountains rose protectingly around us, and every morning and evening our ears were saluted by the tinkling bells of the cattle, as they went and returned to pasture. O how sweet were the meadows when the grass was cut! Lucy Fisher and I have often made hay together, and when the hearty load was completed we have rode home in triumph on its proudest height with the gleam of toil and health upon upon our sunburnt faces. Lucy was a most beautiful girl. Yes, Mary, notwithstanding that incredulous look she certainly was a most beautiful girl. But I anticipate.—We were children together. When Lucy's new baby house was built, she invited me to come and share it. When her mother gave her any delicacy, she always saved a piece for me. We studied together and knitted stockings together. When we talked about the future, as even children will, our lot in life would be interwoven together. But we could not always be children. Lucy was seventeen and I was three months older. I had no mother and sisters, and my father and brother were frequently from home on business. They sometimes went to foreign lands. At such times Lucy always made her home with me. As I said before Lucy was exceedingly attractive in her person, and about the time I speak of, had engaged the affections of Squire Morton's son a young man who had just entered the law in a neighboring town. They seemed made for each other, and how truly Lucy loved him, the world will never know. I said my father and brother were frequently from home. It was on one of these occasions that I was taken sick. Polly in the kitchen and myself were the only inmates of the family.—Lucy Fisher had been unable to come to me for several days, as her mother's health was feeble and their 'help' had left suddenly, making it necessary for Lucy to supply the domestic deficiency. I did not think much of my illness at first, but in a few hours, I was so dreadfully ill that I sent for the doctor. The medical gentleman arrived and seemed exceedingly disturbed when he felt of my pulse and examined my symptoms. I heard him say in answer to Polly's inquiries as he left the room, 'The small pox!' I was not alarmed, for I was too sick to be terrified. A raging thirst seized me. I called for water! water! No one answered my call. What, was I alone? Where was Polly? She had left the house in fright to avoid contagion. The doctor called again and spoke of trying to get a nurse for me—no nurse came. What darkness followed. Must I die alone? My father and brother were on the other side of the globe, and I afterwards learned that people walked on the other side of the street where our house was situated to avoid the contagion. It was night, and the neglected lamp was growing dim. I was tossing with thirst and fever—and covered with the most loathsome sores. Must I die alone? with this sad thought I sank into an unquiet slumber. When I awoke the lamp burned more brightly. A cheerful fire on the hearth was reflected by tall brass andirons. My bed felt easier, my pillow smoothed. A slight form was sitting in the easy chair, and when the bed clothes rustled showing that I was awake, Lucy Fisher came very softly to me with,

"Are you more comfortable now Caroline."

"'Go home Lucy! go home. Do you know what is the matter with me?'

"'It is too late now,' said Lucy with a smile, 'I have been here some time, all the mischief that is to be done, is done; mamma is better, and has a new woman in the kitchen, and I shall stay as long as I please, But you must not talk dear Caroline you are in a raging fever.'

"Then Lucy smoothed my pillow again and took her seat by my side.

"Days and nights flew by, I knew not how many. At length one morning I heard a robin singing at my window, and the little brook at the foot of the garden which I had left ice-bound, I knew was free again; I heard its merry tones as it ran leaping across the meadow. I felt the tide of health returning. It seemed as if I heard a voice addressed to me, 'Be thou clean.'

"Lucy,' I faintly said, 'dear Lucy, are you still here?"

"'Thank God, the knows me, she exclaimed.

"In the twilight of the sick room, Lucy came to my bedside. But dim as the light was, I was frightened at her appearance.

"'You are sick, my poor Lucy.'

"Lucy faintly smiled, and said she had only a slight head-ache.

"'The doctor says I must leave you darling, for a day or two. While I am away, aunt Molly, who has had the small pox, will come and take care of you.'

"In about half an hour, Lucy kissed me affectionately, and then aunt Molly took her place in my sick chamber. I heard a carriage drive away from the door and Lucy left. What, I thought, has Lucy rode home, and it is such a short distance too! Poor Lucy! She had not gone to her father's house to spread the contagion, for she had caught my disorder, but to a house in the woods, called the "Pest House," there to await the event of her sickness. We had both been vaccinated at the same time, some years before, but in our case the preventative had been a failure. I asked aunt Molly every day after my friend, and eagerly inquired of the doctor as he paid me his daily visits, 'How is my Lucy? How is Lucy Fisher.

"'She is getting along,' slowly said the doctor with some hesitation; he did not dare to tell me the real state of the case. 'In a week or two I hope you will be able to see her. Here let me congratulate you,' said the doctor, 'that the disease has left so few traces upon your face. In a short time there will be hardly a mark left.'

"'Then I am not going to look like the tree in front of the school-house?' said I. The tree had been struck with lightening, and nothing but its poor scratched trunk and a few leafless bows remained. 'I am not going to be like that tree, then.'

"How could I be thankful enough! But my Lucy! I could not be sanguine, when I thought of her. I felt that a dark cloud enveloped her.

"One morning the doctor entered my chamber, and smilingly said,

"'Miss Caroline, your friend Lucy Fisher is out of danger. She has indeed been at the brink of the grave, and it is truly wonderful that she survived.'

"'When can I see her?' I said.

"'She goes home this morning, replied the doctor.

"In about an hour, Molly brought my cloak and furs, although it was so late in the season, lest I should catch a cold by my first exposure. How very brightly shone the sun that morning; how tender and green looked the young grapes amid the old and dry—and all nature was whispering in my ear the promise of a beautiful season.—None but a convalescent can know what I enjoyed during that brief walk to Lucy's. Her mother opened the door for me and kissed me tenderly.

"'Where is my Lucy?' I said, but without waiting for an answer, I stepped hastily into the parlor. She was there.—And yet it was not she. Those large beautiful eyes were contracted, never again to beam out in full-orbed glory, and her once round face was lined and scarred, and seamed in hopeless deformity.—'O Lucy,' I said, and falling upon her neck we wept together. This was not the close of the trial. There was a lover in Lucy's case. How would he take the change that had come over her? I think men are different from women about such things.'

"'He is coming,' said Lucy, faintly. He will be here to-morrow.'

"Young Morton was expected in the morning, so I went over to Lucy's as early as I was able, to assist her in preparation to receive her lover. I arranged some young daffodils and May flowers on the little table beside her chair. I set her white morning gown, around her shoulders, I laid my red cassul's hair shawl, a present from my father, that its more intense color might reduce her's. Dear Lucy! I darkened the blinds so that the change in her would not be so obvious. I heard Mr. Morton's step in the hall and left the room.

"He remained with Lucy just five minutes, stepped hastily out of the house, mounted his horse and rode away. I re-entered the room, she and her mother were weeping together. I divined the whole.

"'Lucy, said I, 'how is it?'

"It is all over, she said, attempting to smile.

"'Lucy,' said I, 'I am the wretched cause of all your misery,' adding in a wicked passion, "and I wish I had never been born."

"'Hush! hush!' said Lucy, 'God had good reason for your birth and for my surviving, I love him none the less, or you either. 'Yes she said, looking upward, and smiling through her tears, 'I can trust him in the dark.'

"As I looked upon her poor blighted face, I said to myself, 'Though God has scathed the outer walls of his temple, the spirit is still all glorious within.'

"'Three cheers for Miss Lucy Fisher," exclaimed Jim Arlington, Mary's brother of fourteen, who had come into the room unobserved, and heard the story. "Three cheers for Miss Lucy Fisher. Why, mother, she is as brave as Wellington," the boy's favorite hero, "and those marks on her face are what I call honorable scars.'

Mary crept up softly to her mother, and whispered through her tears.

"Mamma, mamma, may not Miss Fisher come here and live all the time? Does not the Bible say something about entertaining angels?"—Boston Recorder.

"Is He rich?"

How often has this question been asked! Has an acquaintance married a husband—"Is he rich?" is the first enquiry propounded by her friends. Not, "Is he honest, industrious, sober, and honorable," but "Is he rich?" Not, "Has he a mind that distinguishes him among his fellow men, and calls forth their homage and adoration," but "Is he rich—has he the dollars and cents?" He may have everything else—a manly heart, a master intellect; he may be upright, steady, and industrious, but if he lack he is but as sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal." The great sin of our country is idolatry—an idolatry as degrading, yet as complete as that of the Hindoo or Pharisee—even more degrading! for there is something painfully grand and impressive in the single-the-heart, ever moving onward, yet silently, to the great yea and nay-ness harmony of the day, as he comes forth from the chambers of night, heralded by streaming fire! but we bow down to the dollar—the dirt, scrambling dollar, and make it a god! We work for it by day, we lay down after we get some of it by night; we go to the sanctuary of Christ, and, instead of meditating upon his amazing love, we suffer the dollar to come in and take possession of our thoughts!

"The dimes and dollars, and dollars and dimes."

Our lives are spent in the service of our real god-dollar; we bring up our children in the nurture of the dollar; we teach them that the dollar is the main thing to be gained; we teach it by precept example. We profess to be charitable; we profess to feel for the poor; we profess respect for honest poverty; we speak of silver, and gold, and this world's goods as trash," and all the time we are hypocrites and liars, for we think more of our god-dollar than our Saviour Jesus Christ! We have missionary enterprises on foot, and we talk pathetically of the heathen bowing down to "stocks and stones; and yet how much better are we bowing down to silver and gold? With as much propriety may they send preachers to us, as we to them. The practises of men all around us belie their professions—they profess to be followers of Christ, and they are the followers of the dollar. If the realization of the dollar involves the selling of the widow's only bed, or the orphan's last dress, there are people, professed Christian's too, who would not hesitate an instant. 'Is he rich?' Yes, he is rich, but riches shall take to themselves wings and fly away; and when he shall strive to enter heaven, and shall not be able, then he will understand how hard it is for a camel to go through the eye of a needle.—Era.

A new Boundary Dispute With Great Britain.

Under this title a correspondent of the Tribune writes from San Francisco, as follows:

We are in danger of having another bitter, baleful boundary dispute with Great Britain, and the interests of the public, as well as of private persons, demand that the question should be settled at the earliest possible moment. The dispute is whether the boundary line between the United States and Great Britain, as defined by the Oregon territory of 1846 was intended to run through the straits of Rosario or the Canal de Haro. The first article of the treaty says:

"From the point on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude where the boundary laid down in existing treaties and conventions between the United States and Great Britain terminated (on the summit of the Rocky Mountains) the line of boundary shall be continued westward along the said forty-ninth parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of the said channel and of Fuca's Straits to the Pacific Ocean."

It is singular that two such diplomatists as James Buchanan and Sir Richard Pakenham, the negotiators of the treaty, should ever have left a boundary line with a description so indefinite. The line in running from latitude forty-nine deg. down the channel which separates the Continent from Vancouver's Island." "The channel" as though they were but one, while in fact there are many—almost as many as there are islands in the Archipelago de Haro, which lies between Vancouver's Island and Bellingham Bay. The English claim that the intention of the treaty was that the boundary should run through the Straits of Rosario, eastward of Oreas and Lopez Islands, while the Americans assert that the proper line as described by the treaty is through the Canal de Haro, between San Juan and Vancouver's Islands. Both channels have abundant water for the largest vessels, not less than twenty five fathoms in any place, and both are wide and deep enough for convenient navigation. The Canal de Haro averages about two miles and a half in width at the nearest place; the Strait of Rasaro is less than two miles wide at its nearest part and averages about three miles. In regard to directness neither channel has much advantage over the other, and in depth they are alike ranging from 20 to 200 fathoms. Vessels going from Victoria to Fraser River generally go through the Canal de Haro and might go between San Juan and Oreas Islands, or eastward of Cypress Island. It is then impossible from the mere words of the treaty to discern what channel is meant.

These disputed islands contain some good land, but not much; their entire surface is not more than 120,000 acres, not half of which would find purchasers now if offered at 50 cents an acre. Of course it will be long before the two classes of settlers—the American and the British—get into disputes, and then we must have an international quarrel, unless speedy and judicious measures be taken to settle the question; such a quarrel as may cause us indirectly if not directly, more millions than the islands are worth thousands. The Americans who have gone up San Juan Island, knowing it to be in dispute, and without authority from the Government, are actuated chiefly by a desire to make a large speculation out of the quarrel which they forsee; though they will pretend that their motives are truly patriotic; and many will be found to justify them with the maxim "our country right or wrong," which in common acception means "let us steal all we can out of pure patriotism." The newspapers of Washington Territory and Oregon have commenced writing sensation articles about the dispute, taking it for granted that every claim made for the United States as against Great Britain may be just.

You are aware that the Boundary Commissioners of the two nations have been for a long time at Semiahmoo, or thereabout; but, after being on the ground eight or nine months, have done little or nothing. It seems now that the delay is caused by this dispute about the channel; each party insists on its line, and they refuse to run the survey on the mainland until the water line is fixed. The question, however, is not one for surveyors, but for diplomatists, and the sooner they get hold of it, and dispatch it, the better. Both Governments are to blame for the loose wording of the treaty of 1846, and, perhaps, the best way of finishing the matter now would be by giving San Juan Island to Britain, and Orcas and Lopez Islands to the United States, by which arrangement the disputed property would be nearly equally divided, and the boundary line would run near the centre of the Archipelago.

Daniel E. Sickles Acquitted!

EXTRAORDINARY SCENE IN COURT.

The following is a graphic description of the closing scenes of the Sickles trial:—The door is opened and the deputy Marshall calls out "Make room for the jury." In they come one by one, and proceeded to take their seats in the boxes. There is one general movement in the crowded court room to get a look at their faces. All restraint is forgotten. Benches and forms and tables are mounted by the most excited or most adventurous. "Here they come" is heard hurriedly spoken on all sides, then there is a succession of cries of "Down in front!" "Get of the benches," "Sit down!" "Silence in Court!" "Order, order!" but it seems impossible to restore order. The Judge directs the clerk to call the names of the jury. The uproar instantly subsides, and as the clerk calls the jurors, and they severally respond, one of the officers calling out the number. When the twelfth name was called and responded to, a pin might have been heard to drop in the suddenly stilled crowd. The jury are all standing.

The CLERK—Daniel E. Sickles, stand up and look at the jury.

Sickles stood up.

The CLERK—How say you? Do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty or not guilty.

Mr. ARNOLD—Not Guilty.

As these words fell from the lips of the foreman, there was one wild, thrilling, tumultuous hurrah sent up by the spectators. Cheer after cheer resounded in the Court-room, and was taken up by the multitude on the outside and repeated. Hats and handkerchiefs were waved, and there was one general rush towards the dock. In the midst of the uproar, the stentorian voice of Mr. Stanton was heard addressing the Court in these words:—"I move that Sickles be discharged from custody.

Marshal SELDEN—Come to order, gentlemen; this is a place where there should be no noise.

Mr. STANTON, boiling over with excitement, said,—In the name of Mr. Sickles and counsel, I desire to return thanks to the jury.

Judge CRAWFORD, who appeared to be the only person in court not excited, said, —"Mr. Stanton, wait till the verdict is recorded."

The CLERK—(to jury)—Your verdict is that you find Daniel E. Sickles "Not Guilty."

The jury nodded affirmatively.

Mr. STANTON—I now move that Mr. Sickles be discharged from custody.

Judge CRAWFORD—The Court so orders.

Mr. STANTON, turning round, said,—"Now go it."

The JUDGE said—"No noise."

The precaution was not heeded. Sickles amid the renewed cheers of the audience, was taken out of the dock. Capt. Wiley and Mr. Brega, the former who is one of Sickles' most devoted friends, kissed him at the moment of his deliverance, and held fast by him as they tried to make their way to the door. It was slow work, for congratulations, earnest, loud, and frankly expressed, saluted Sickles at all points.—Though strong emotion was exhibited, his eye was calm and steady, and the effort which he manifestly made to retain calmness and composure was successful. His expression betrayed no feeling of joy, but was rather that of a man who felt as though he had run no risk, and that the trial through which he had passed could have no other result.

The jury evinced a desire to congratulate him, and he stepped over the forms to meet their salutations, which were heartily tendered. Finally, by dint of much crushing and great exertion, a passage to the door was effected. So soon as he was recognized from the outside, the cheers were again taken up. Mr. Shaw of the Herald had rushed to the National Hotel as soon as the jury returned their verdict, and jumping on the driver's box, drove a carriage to the Court House. As Mr. Sickles stepped down the stone stairs of the City Hall, surrounded and supported by his immediate personal friends, he was again cheered.

Calls were made for a speech. With considerable exertion, for he was fast becoming faint, he was got into one of the carriages in waiting, together, Messrs. Graham, Wiley, and Bryan of New York. A movement was made by the crowd to take the horses out of the carriage and draw it themselves, but the movement was dejected in time and prevented. Finally the carriages drove away, followed by many others and an immense crowd. Mr. Sickles was taken to the house of Mr. M. Blair next door to his former residence.

Disaster on Lake Ontario.

WRECK OF THE SCHOONER "S. BUTTLES."

The terrible storm on Saturday was doubtless prolific of mischief to the Lake marine. We hear of but one serious disaster as yet, and that occurred on Saturday night, ten miles east of the mouth of the Genesee, where the British schooner "S. Buttles" went ashore. This vessel was laden with staves from Port Burwell, Canada, for Clayton on the St. Lawrence, and was commanded by Capt. Pollock, who was part owner. Capt. P. states that he left Port Burwell on the 18th inst., and in due time passed the Welland Canal into Lake Ontario. On Friday night the storm came on heavy from the north-west and on Saturday the wind changed to the north. He was keeping down the Lake when the gale came on with such fury, and would have made for Charlotte but for the snow storm which made it unsafe to approach the south shore. The ship was therefore put for the north west, and before midnight was well up in the south shore. The job was carried away upon shore, and the vessel sprung a leak. This was in the night of Friday, and when the storm was raging fiercely. The captain put the entire crew, six in number, to the pumps, to keep the vessel free and let her drift, as the only hope of saving her and his crew. Friday the poor fellows worked at the pumps for their lives, the sea constantly breaking over the deck and carrying all before it. Among the crew was one man older than the rest, and less able to endure the fatigue. He was washed overboard from the pumps, but fortunately the receding wave brought him within the reach of a rope thrown to him, and he was drawn in and saved. The men had to be lashed to the pumps to prevent being swept overboard. The bulwarks were cut away to let the seas pass over the deck. During Saturday, Capt. Pollock encouraged his men to labour, and worked with them himself to keep the vessel afloat, still hoping that there would be a change for the better. If they had left the pumps the ship would have went down, and with it the crew, as no boat could have lived in such a sea as was then running. Capt. Pollock is an old sailor on both ocean and lake, but he says he never saw a lake storm before which brought so heavy a sea.—The schooner continued to drift all day Saturday—the crew still struggling to keep her afloat, with little nourishment as no fires could be kept on board, the hatches being barred down to keep out the sea.—About 12 o'clock on Saturday night, Capt. Pollock saw signs of land, and in 5 minutes after he struck. He could have thrown his anchors, but he feared the vessel would founder at anchor if the anchors held.—Knowing that she must go ashore, he promptly resolved to exercise a choice as to the manner of her going on. He ran forward and gave his orders to put the boat for the shore, and cutting away his mainsail he let her go on bow foremost. The waves carried her high upon a flat rock, where she was likely to find an easy bed. The men then ran below and scuttled her, and she soon became easy. Had the schooner gone on broadside, she would have no doubt gone to pieces and all hands would have perished. The sea was so heavy at this time that no landing could be effected, and the captain and his crew crawled into the forecastle to get shelter, and remained there about twelve hours, when the storm abated, and on Sunday, at noon, they obtained some food. When the ship went ashore the Captain states that the seas would strike her stern and fly to the mast-head. The S. Buttles belongs to Pollock & Thompson of Port Stanley, is of one hundred and twenty-five tons burden, and seven years old. The Captain thinks she can be got off with the aid of a steam-tug, for which he goes to Oswego to-day. He is not certain about insurance, but thinks there is a policy of $2,300 on the vessel in the North Western Company.

The State of Italy.

Our correspondent at Turin, writing on the 16th ult., says:—I send you some items of news that you may rely upon.—Sardinia will be admitted into the Congress; Austria's consent is all that is wanting. She proposes a supplementary congress of Italian princes at Rome, whence they may send an invitation to the Congress of the Five Powers. So secure does Austria feel as to their votes, that in her opinion one invited Power will serve to represent them all. I forgot to say that Vienna desires Piedmont to be excluded from this Roman congress. The acceptance by Austria to take part in the congress proposed by Russia may be said to be conditional, as she only intends to treat and discuss the question on the basis proposed by Lord Cowley.

Russia, on the other hand seems to contemplate a more enlarged treatment of the question, and a letter received here yesterday from the Sardinian envoy at St. Petersburgh, Count Baldassi, again assures the Piedmontese Government of Russia's partial good wishes.

A letter from the Sardinian legation at Florence says that at Forli, a town in the Romagna, a bloody contest had occurred between the people and the Swiss troops.

At Florence itself there is great excitement. The Tuscan Monitore of the 23rd, suspends the little liberty of the press that was left, and re-establishes the censorship. There was a talk of Maldasegoni's resignation and that of the other Ministers; but it seems there are repentance and fear in the Pitti Palace. The new minister of Public Instruction, Martini, demands the admission into the Government of two Liberal chiefs, one of them being Lucchesi it is said.—Laqueci continues to be the soul of the reaction in the Austrian sense. Now that the freedom of the press is suspended, Tuscany will of course be inundated with secret publications. The directors of the Bibliotaca civile dell'Italiano do not mean to give way an inch, and if peace is not concluded within a few days, there is every appearance that the Government will be overthrown.

The City of Quito Destroyed by an Earthquake.

3000 LIVES LOST,

The U. S. steamer St. Louis from Panama, brings intelligence that on the 22nd day of March at half past eight in the morning, an earthquake which shook the mountain range of the Chimborazo for the space of four minutes destroyed almost entirely the city of Quito, in Ecuador, and killed from 2,000 to 3,000 persons. The churches, monasteries, convents and State edifices are almost all rent to fragments.—The Convent of San Augustin, the Tabernacle de la Capilla, the Temple of Sagrario, the Cathedral, the Convent of Santa Catalina, the Palacio del Obispo, the Chapel of la Magarel, the Chapels of the Cathedral, of the Convencion of the Hospital, of Carmen Vejo, the cloisters of the Convent of Santo Domingo, a part of the Cementerio of San Fernandez, are all partially or wholly in ruins. Also, the Convents of San Diego, Santa Clara, Santa and Barbara.—There is scarcely a house in the city that is not badly damaged. That portion of the Palace occupied by the Minister of the Interior, a great part of the College of San Luis, and the splendid mansion of Dr. Albuga, have also fallen. All the principal buildings of the neighbouring towns of San Antonio, Cotocolla, Machacha, Chilegallo and Magdalena have been destroyed. The loss of property is estimated at th ee millions of dollars; and from the poverty of the people it will be impossible to repair and rebuild by great number of the better class of edifices destroyed. The shocks were felt simultaneously in Tacunga, Amato and Alausi; and in Tinpullo the earth opened in various places. The earthquake was also felt at Quayquil, but did no damage there. The Temples of San Francisco, del Sagrario and Santa clara were of beautiful architecture; the temples and convents of Santa Domingo, la Merced and San Augustin, all had fine stone facades and towers; the temples of Santa Catalina and Conception, and the Hospital had also stone facades. Quito is said to contain 50,000 inhabitants. It is built on an extensive plain, against the mountains of the Pangeelle and Pichincha, and is about 1,500 feet above the level of the sea. Most of the houses are two stories, some three, and a part one story. Many are built of burnt brick, with handsome facades, but the greatest portion are unburned brick above.

Literature and Art in London.

With a general election imminent, such modest matters as Literature and Art naturally occupy but a very secondary place in the public attention. The most exciting literature now is decidedly the manifestos of the members to their constituents, and some of these are perused with more attention than is bestowed upon the novels of the season. We do not hear that Mr. Thackery intends making another attempt to get into Parliament; nor even that Mr. Dickens will attempt to carry his oratory in favor of a reformed administration at Drury Lane Theatre into St. Stephen's Chapel. Indeed one patent fact which stares every candidate for Parliamentary honors in the face is enough to deter any literary man from taking part in this election—and that is the certainty that, after all the expense of being returned, the new Parliament will have to be dissolved and reelected once more as soon as it has passed a Reform bill. Now there are not many literary men—not even such magnates as we have named—who can conveniently afford to stump up some five thousand pounds for the luxury of addressing Mr. Speaker.

And so it is that while the turmoil in politics is at its height, the literary world is pretty quite. The Yates and Thackery squabble has died away, without invention of Judge and Jury—going out in a week pamphlet from a tater, proving nothing but that he had taken the wrong course to right himself.

Everything is now settled about Mr. Dickens's new paper, except what is to become of the old one. Messrs. Bardbury & Evans held one-quarter of Household Words, Mr. Dickens five-eighths, and Mr. Wills [the editor] the remaining share.—Mr. Wills [who was the originator of Household Words] goes with Mr. Dickens and here lies the difficulty. The Bardburys have filed a bill to force a sale; but when the paper comes into the market one will be in such a position to buy it in as Messrs. Dickens and Wills. For example, suppose £5,000 bid ($50,000): if the Bradburys bid it they would have to pay £2,000 of it to their opponents, but if Dickens bought it he would only have to pay £2,000. I am inclined to think, therefore, that the property will be bought in by Mr. Dickens, and merged into All Round the Year—a title which is regarded as the cleanest possible, and painfully suggestive of "All round my hat." As we doubt you already know, the new serial will be opened with a tale by Dickens (and report over here says that a New York publisher has agreed to pay a sum for early stereotype of the numbers. The contributors of the new paper will be the same as are now on the Household Words staff—all following their new ship. The principle names among these are Mrs. Gaskell, Messrs. Hollingshed, Wray, Thomas, Thornbury, Lang, Wilkie, Collins, &c., names which will be, for the most part familiar with you. Mr. George Augustus Sala, at one time the great attraction upon Household Words, left it some time ago, on account of a quarrel with Mr. Dickens. The quarrel has not returned, and it is believed by many that should Bradbury & Evans succeed in keeping Household Words alive, they will secure the services of this graphic and now popular writer.

The English publishers have put forward their programmes for the coming season and they furnish materials for a very respectable list. Messrs. Longman [who publish certainly more books and books of a high class too, than any other publisher] announce among many others, a volume of Recollections of cynical old Sam Rogers,

Mr. Barnum has left London and his place is not supplied by Lola Montez. The success of your competitor at St. James Hall was undoubted. He drew crowds, who did not inquire too curiously how it was that a man who refused to teach others how to make money, could not supply a bit or two how to keep it. Lola delivered her first lecture in Londonderry last night at St. Martin's Hall and the place was crammed, a very fair show of ladies attending. At Dublin the ladies were so shy of the fair aventuriere that only eight female costumes could be counted in a ball crowded with black coats. But in Dublin they are wonderously particular, and never would merit the rebuke which Justice Maule had ministered once in a Court full of ladies who were bravely sitting out some very strong evidence "Speak up, my man," said the Judge to an unwilling witness, "You needn't be afraid; all the respectable women have left the Court long ago." However, the Dubliners are generally thought to have been a little too particular; for it is undeniable that many fair candidates for public favor obtain it there, whose characters are not a whit better than that of Lola Montez.

UNITED STATES NEWS.

In the Supreme Court of Rhode Island on Saturday night, thirty-two wives were divorced from their husbands, and seven husbands from their wives.

Sun-Dogs.

The phenomenon of sun-dogs or mock suns, which was observed at Boston and at Montreal on Saturday, April 2, was on the same day observed at Norfolk, N. Y., a correspondent of the Tribune sending from that place a full account of the appearance presented.

A Mirage.

At about six o'clock on Wednesday evening, a magnificent sight attracted attention in Oswego. The peculiar state of the atmosphere caused a refraction which presented the Canadian Shore, which seemed but a few miles distant. The trees and bench were distinctly visible, and the phenomenon was one of unusual beauty in every particular.

Crime in New York.

The reign of the pistol and knife appears to have full sway in New York. The Express thinks that, since the beginning of the year there have been at least three dozen murders in that city, including such assaults that subsequently resulted in death.—In one week—from Wednesday to Wednesday—the papers recorded fifteen murders, or murderous assaults, without taking into account the bodies of unknown men found in the river.

Lumber.

The cargo of the sch oner Lavana to arrive, has been sold at $7 50 for boards and $8 for trips. First clear and dry sells at $25 to $26; second clear, $20 to $21; third clear at $15 to $16; common boards at $7 50 to $8; fencing at $9 to $9 50.—Chicago Times.

Mexico.

The Steamship Tennessee has arrived at New Orleans from Vera Cruz, bringing highly important Mexican Advices. The Juarez Government had been recognized by Minister McLane, and this action on the part of the U. S. Minister was followed by great rejoicing. Miramon had returned to Orizaba. From the capital we learn that on the 2nd inst. the Liberal forces, under Degollado, made an unsuccessful attempt to capture it. The numbers engaged on either side are not stated, but the number of slain is put down at one thousand, equally divided between the belligerents.

Smith O'Brien.

Mr. Smith O'Brien is enjoying a most delightful tour, and is everywhere received with the respect and admiration which his character and history inspire. He has visited Senator Hammond's plantation, and "attended divine service with the negroes," the service being conducted by a coloured hand In company with Senator Toombs, he then visited Mr. Stephens at Crawfordville; thence proceeded to Montgomery, [where his arrival was eagerly waited by many friends, and especially by Judge Phegelan and R. A Colclough, formerly of Wexford county]—thence he set out for Mobile last Saturday; and he proposed to arrive in New Orleans about the first or second of April.—Southern Citizen.

The Prince of Wales in "the Holy City."

The correspondent of the Times at Rome furnishes the following:—"It will be out of place here to speak more fully than I have hitherto done of our young Prince, and I have the greater pleasure in doing so as I think I can quiet the tears of many old ladies of the other sex in England, who dread the possibility of his Royal Highness's yielding to the attractions of the Lady of Babylon. The Prince's career appears to be marked with much prudence, and personally he has won golden opinions from all classes of persons. His self-possession and gentle unpretended manners excite universal admiration, and everyone was delighted to observe the boyish glee with which he entered into the amusements of the Carnival. In all the gossip that I have heard regarding the Prince, there are only two points to which any exception has been made. First, it was objected that his interview with the Pope was not strictly private, Colonel Bruce having been also present. Secondly, it was objected that the interview was short, and was terminated not by the reigning Sovereign. With respect to the first exception made, I may observe that there was not wanting those here who hoped much from the severity of the manner of the Holy Father at that interview. On this, however, as on all other occasions, the conduct of the Prince has been marked by much prudence. There was a great run among the several monastic institutions, as usual jealous of each other to make an impression on the Prince's mind By one gentleman, a Jesuit, he was claimed on the ground of being the only Welshman there. An antagonism was offered in the person of another gentleman, who wrapped in Welsh flannel and St. Isidore to the Prince that his Royal Highness managed to steer safely between Scylla and Charybdis, going as a Welshman to the Jesuit, exploring the interesting antiquities of St. Clement's with his antagonist, and appearing on the 17th inst., St. Patrick's Day, at St. Isidore with a shamrock in his hat. So that if all are jealous all are content. This is as it should be with the future Sovereign, who should know no distinction between the lingos. The moral of all this gossip is, that respectable and timid old ladies in England may feel perfectly assured as to the proselytism of the Prince who is under the instruction of the Italian Church, [illegible] Rome, guided by [illegible]

Defeat of the Ministry!

It is gratifying to find at any time a check put upon an unprincipled Government, but especially at the present time when they appear to be running by "express" the downward path of reckless extravagance. The Ministerial Supply Bill was thrown out in the Upper House on Saturday last, by a majority of three. The reason assigned for this treatment of the Bill is, because the Government would not pledge themselves to spend no money on the removal of the Seat of Government to Quebec, without the sanction of Parliament. By such a removal what an enormous and unnecessary expense would be incurred, and that such a course would increase the public debt, which has already swollen to almost incalculable dimensions. As was stated in the Legislative Council we have in addition to the enormous balance of trade against us in the Province, to pay to British capitalists £1,020,000 annually for the interest on our public debts. What a dead weight upon the energies and best interests of our country. How powerfully must such a state of things retard its prosperity, and instead of contributing to its development have the very opposite effect. It will discourage emigration from other countries; nor is that all, it will also drive away people from this country to where they may not be so heavily oppressed by taxation.—Who, then, does not see the absolute necessity of retrenchment in conducting the Government of the country? Were the Cartier-Macdonald Ministry gentlemen of honor and integrity, and desirous that the best interests of the country be maintained, they would at once resign, and give way to those who seem to possess the confidence of the people.

DROWNED.—A man named Donald McRea who was engaged in running timber on the River, was drowned on Saturday last, at Perry's Mill. It seems that the crib on which McRea was engaged broke loose a short distance above the dam, on account of which it could not proceed down the River. He, however, together with the other men employed on the broken crib, managed to get on board another crib which was coming down. On reaching the slide McRea who, it is supposed, was not properly secured, was swept into the current and drowned. The body has not yet been found.

QUEEN'S BIRTH-DAY.—We see by our exchanges that preparations are already being made in some of our Towns and Cities for the celebration of her Majesty's birth-day. We hope the people of Peterboro' will follow suit, and that our Rifle Company, Bands, Societies, and Citizens generally, may not, as in former years, desert the Town, and leave it lifeless; but invite our neighbours from Port Hope, Cobourg, Lindsay, and elsewhere to participate in a celebration here.

Mr. T. B. Conolly, will deliver a lecture this evening, under the auspices of the Mechanics' Institute—Subject, "Ups and Downs of Life," in the Town Hall, commencing at 8 o'clock. Admission 12½ cents.

Arrival of the "Africa."

WAR REGARDED AS INEVITABLE.

New York, April 28.

The royal mail steamship Africa, from Liverpool on the 16th instant, reached her dock at half-past six p. m. Her news has been mainly anticipated by the Canadian.

The Dresden Journal alleges its acquaintance with the fact that, according to a recent counter-proposal by France, which is also said to be seconded in other quarters, the Congress will assemble on April 23rd, at Carlsruhe, Baden, and commence operations by resolving on a general disarming.

The Paris despatches state that the progress of the negotiations of the Congress is very slow, owing to the great difficulties to be overcome.

The London News says that it is just as possible that the Congress may prepare and embitter, instead of averting a war.

The Paris correspondence of the London Herald says there were reasons for believing that Austria's proposals as to the points to be submitted to the Congress are wholly unacceptable to France.

The Paris Patrie says that France cannot be expected to diminish her army, nor to send back a single cannon to the arsenals.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons, Lord Stanley had stated that the duty on hardware in India was to be increased from 5 to 10 per cent., on both foreign and British manufactures.

It is intended that Parliament should be dissolved on the 21st, in which case the borough elections would take place on the 27th of April, and the county elections on the 2nd of May.

Thirty of the Neapolitan sailors have left England.

Lady Morgan, the authoress, is dead.

PRUSSIA.

All the French Mediterranean ports have been ordered to join their allies forthwith.

A Prussian war officer states that 200,000 men would soon depict the Rhine.

The receipt of a memorandum from Count Reul, hostile to Piedmont was spoken of.

Warlike materials are accumulating at Marseilles to an alarming extent. Five steam-frigates had gone to Algeria, it is supposed to bring troops back to France.

The Monatstal Diplomatiques had been allowed to resume its issue.

The Daily News' Paris correspondent says that Lord Cowley and Count Walewski, after a long discussion, separated with the conviction that very serious differences of opinion exist between France and England.

Nine gun-boats for the Adriatic are ordered to be made ready at Cherbourgh without delay.

AUSTRIA.

The Archduke Albrecht has gone on a special mission to Berlin.

Austria was willing to make important concessions to Prussia on certain points in dispute, and a perfect understanding between them was considered highly probable.

Warlike preparations are continued by some of the smaller German states. The Bavarian army had been placed on a war footing.

The Times' Vienna correspondent states that during the last few days several of the leading papers had openly declared that the Germans would not shed one drop of blood either for the maintenance of the special treaties or for the Austrian Concordat.

ITALY.

The political prisoner at Naples, whose fate was determined by the decree of the 18th ult., had received passport for the United States.

It was reported at Rome that the Pope would protest against the European Congress.

Sir Moses Montefiorre had arrived at Rome, with a petition from the Jews in England and America, in favor of the boy Mortara.

Rumors were current that the King of Naples was either dead or in the last extremities. Nothing authentic was known, however.

HOLLAND.

Holland and Belgium are said to have concluded a treaty for mutual defence in case of war.

RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg, April 12.

The opening of navigation is anticipated in about eight days.

WALLACHIA.

An infernal machine, supposed to be intended for the Hospodar Couza, had been discovered and seven persons arrested.

EGYPT.

Advices are favourable to the Suez Canal. Public functionaries were ordered to assist M. Lesseps, and the Governor of Suez had been deposed.

COCHIN CHINA.

The attack on Sargon took place on the 17th of February, and was perfectly successful. Nine forts strongly armed, were cannonaded and stormed. The French loss was small, but the enemy's loss was heavy.

INDIA AND CHINA.

Letters add nothing of moment to accounts already published.

At Amor trade was stopping by the report that a body of rebels had attacked Chang Chow. The report required confirmation.

LATEST.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says that the result of the second meeting of the Conference is, that England, France, Russia, Prussia and Sardinia recognize the double election of Couliza.—Austria and Turkey stood aloof.

A St. Petersburg despatch of the 14th instant announce that in consequence of a victory by General Torang I, 2,000 Circassians had come into the Russian camp.

The Times' Paris correspondent describes the aspect of affairs as so sombre as to justify the renunciation of all hopes of peace.

Five thousand more troops had arrived in Marseilles from Algiers.

Manufacture of Silk in China.

In a work published by Imperial authority, there are numerous wood-cuts, accompanied by letter-press, explanatory of the different processes of the silk manufacture, and detailing all the operations connected with the planting of the mulberry, and the gathering of the leaves, up to the final weaving of the silk. Besides the common mulberry of China, which differs somewhat from that of Europe, they, occasionally, in feeding the worms, have recourse to a wild specimen of the morus tribe, as well as to the leaves of another tree, supposed to be a variety of ash.

The Chinese pay especial attention to the quantity of nourishment with which the silk worm is supplied; as upon this, they say, depends the quantity of silk which the worm will produce. They calculate that the same number of insects which would, if they had attained their full size in from twenty-three to twenty-five days, produce twenty-five ounces of silk, would only yield twenty ounces if their growth occupied twenty-eight days, and only ten ounces if forty days. During the first twenty-four hours of the creature's existence, the patient Chinese feeds the objects of his care forty-eight times, or once every half hour, and during the second day and night thirty times, and so on, reducing the number of meals as the worm grows older. The care bestowed on their culture, and the numerous precautions taken to preserve them clean and warm, are curiously expressed in the following extract from an old Chinese work on the subject:

"The place where their habitations are built must be retired, free from noisome smells, cattle, and all noises; a noisome smell, or the least fright, makes great impressions upon so tender a breed; even the barking of dogs and the crowing of cocks are capable of putting them in disorder when they are newly hatched.

"For the purpose of paying them every attention, an affectionate mother is provided for the worms, who is careful to supply their wants: she is called Isan-mow, mother of the worms. She takes possession of the chamber but not till she has washed herself, and put on clean clothes which have not the least ill-smell; she must not have eaten anything immediately before, or have handled any wild animal, the smell of which is very prejudicial to these tender creatures; she must be clothed in a plain habit, without any lining, that she may be more sensible to the warmth of the place, and accordingly increase or lessen the fire; but she must carefully avoid making a smoke or raising a dust, which would be very offensive to these tender creatures, which must be carefully honoured before the first time of casting their rough. Every day is to them a year, and but, in a manner it's four seasons—the morning is the spring, the middle of the day the summer, the evening the autumn, and the night the winter.

When the worms have cast their second skin, reached their greatest size, and assumed a transparent yellowish colour, they are removed into places divided into compartments, preparatory to their spinning.—In the course of a week after the commencement of the silken cocoons are complete, and it now becomes necessary to take them in hand before the pupa turn into moths, which would immediately bore their way out, and spoil the cocoons.—When a certain number, therefore, have been laid aside for the sake of future eggs, the pupæ in the bulk of the cocoons are killed by being placed in jars under layers of salt and leaves, with a complete exclusion of air. They are subsequently placed in moderately warm water, which dissolves the glutinous substance that binds the silk together, and the filament is wound off upon reels. This is put up in bundles of a certain size and weight, and either becomes an article of merchandize under the name of "raw silk," or is subjected to the loom, and manufactured into various stuffs for home or for foreign consumption. Notwithstanding the apparent simplicity of their looms, they will imitate exactly the newest and most elegant patterns from England or France. The Chinese particularly excel in the production of damasks and flowered satins.—Their crape has never yet been perfectly imitated; and they make a species of soushang silk, called at Canton ponge, which becomes more soft as it is longer used.

A Curious Mistake!

THE WRONG MAN IN THE WRONG PLACE.

We copy the following laughable incident from a late number of the Glasgow Herald:—

On Wednesday last a carter, named John Russell, was apprehended by the police on the charge of having, on that day, by careless driving fractured a man's leg in High Street. The case against Russell assumed a somewhat serious aspect, and the police deemed it necessary to report the affair to the Sheriff, which was done in due course. It so happened that the same day a man was discovered in Glasgow Green, evidently laboring under temporary insanity, and the police there thought it their duty to take him into custody. This was not such an easy matter, however; but by dint of considerable exertion the insane man was taken to the South Station House in Jail Square by several officers. This case was also reported to the Sheriff's authorities, and two medical gentlemen were sent to examine the man, who also gave his name as John Russell. The doctors found that he was actually insane, and granted a certificate to that effect, which was without loss of time sent to the Sheriff, who issued a warrant for Russell's removal to Gartnavel Asylum. This was all very well, but, as the sequel will show, a mistake of a somewhat innocent but very laughable kind happened thereupon. The Sheriff's officers who were entrusted with the warrant had no idea that their real prisoner was lying in the South Station House, which is rather an unusual place of detention, and therefore, on the strength of it, demanded the production of John Russell, the "daft" man. The turnkey, acting upon the principle that all men are to a certain extent "daft" who place themselves under circumstances which bring them as prisoners to the police office, at once produced Russell the carter, who was in durance for fracturing the unfortunate man's leg. The carter, having some glimmering of a liberation, rather joco-ely went along with the officers, and entered the cab which was in waiting, and immediately afterwards drove off. Under the gentle motion the carter remained well at ease for a time; but as he observed that the vehicle passed through the centre of the city into the suburbs, and from the suburbs into the country, some rather anxious thoughts began to arise in his noddle as to what might be the upshot of this mysterious ride; for he well knew that if he had committed a crime at all, he must answer for it in Glasgow, and not in any rural region far beyond the headquarters of the Sheriff, and also beyond the chance of bail, and even far away from Glasgow prison. The man could not comprehend it, and dark visions of the Spanish Inquisition and private torture began to flit before his alarmed and distempered fancy; upon which he implored the officers, who were not very ferocious-looking men after all, to tell him in the name of mercy what was the meaning of this horrid ride, and where it was to end? The officers advised the excited man to compose himself, intimating that though he might not be aware of it himself, he was decidedly a "daft," and they were taking him to a place—Gartnavel to wit—where he would receive all the attention necessary in his unhappy condition. "Me daft?" screamed the carter; "Lord save us! I'm as clear in my senses as ever I was in a' my born days. I was only put in for coupin a body in the street, and brakin' his leg, and it was his ain fau't after a', nane o' mine. Wha ever heard o' sic horrid Egyptia iniquity in a Christian country as pittin' a man into a madhouse for only brakin' banes? Dae tak me back, like good sowls! They'll maybe squeeze me into a straucht jacket, and pit the clay cap on my head before they're done wi' me." The officers took the matter quite coolly; they did not argue the matter with the agonised carter for it was no new thing for them to find a really insane man protest that he was as wise as the Lord President of the Court of Session; and so interjecting a few words and then by way of consolation to their wretched prisoner, they drove along, and in due course entered the portals of Gartnavel. One of the surgeons was immediately in attendance, and the officers, by way of giving a hint as to the delusion the patient was labouring under, detailed the extraordinary assertions he had made about breaking the man's leg. The carter backed this up by asseverations of the most urgent character, but they had no effect upon the mind of the medical officer. "Poor man," said he, "delusions of this sort are nothing uncommon in the early stages of insanity; get him into a hot bath directly." The doctor's instructions were accordingly carried out—the carters voice in the business not being at all consulted. The officers afterwards retired, leaving their late prisoner in a situation of becoming in reality "daft" as fast as possible. Thus matters remained till late in the same afternoon, when the wife of the carter called at the Central Police Office, Albion Street, for the purpose of supplying him with some victuals of a more substantial quality than those afforded by the establishment. "John Russell," said the officer on duty, on being informed for whom the victuals were intended; "Nonsense! John Russell's mad, and ill Gartnavel!" The carters wife nearly fainted. "Guid pity me," said she; "can it be possible that my man was nae weak in the head as to lose his senses for sic a trifle as brakin' a weavers leg! Wha could hae tocht it." By this time, however, some light began to break in upon the affair.—Was there not a John Russell in the South Station, and had not the Sheriff's officers taken the wrong man? An inquiry was actively made, the mistake discovered, and the Sheriff's officials congratulated with, who without fear of time required to Gartnavel, liberated the carter, who had by this time come round a little, and declared that he would never forget the event, for it had been the means of affording him the first hint both he had ever got in his life; they, at the same time, got the really "daft" John Russell into the asylum—thus putting, in every sense of the word, the right men in their "right places."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

THE FRENCH EMPIRE.

PARIS.—The grand review of the soldiers of the army of Paris, favoured by beautiful weather, passed off, so far as our own observation and information go, without any incident worthy of notice. There were about 50,000 troops upon the ground. Most of the regiments had their third war battalion as a consequence of the recent creation of fourth battalions, which will constitute the "depots" of regiments. The Emperor and Empress, the Princess Clotilde, the Imperial Prince (in his uniform as a corporal of Grenadiers), and Prince Jerome and Napoleon, were present, and were very well received by the people, and enthusiastically by the troops.

The Emperor and Empress on Monday honoured the Opera Comique with their presence, to witness the first representation of M. Meyerbeer's "Pardon de Ploermel."

It is announced in official circles that Prince Gortschakoff, the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, is shortly expected in Paris.

RUSSIA.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—An Imperial ukase for the loan of £12,000,000 at 3 per cent was published on Wednesday. The ukase states that the loan has been concluded through Messrs. Thompson, Bonar & Co., of St. Petersburgh, and Mr. Magnus, the banker, of Berlin. No subscriber to the loan is to be allotted less than £100 or more than £1,000 of the debt. On Tuesday the new loan was done here at 71.

According to private advices received from Kiatchta, in the Governmental district of Irkutsk, on the Chinese frontier, famine is prevailing in the southern part of China.

"No one here," says a recent letter, "ever remembers such a mild winter in Russia as the late one. The Gulfs of Finland and Bothnia have been scarcely covered with ice, and in the month of February a vessel arrived at Helsingfors with a cargo from Copenhagen. This is perhaps the first that has ever attempted such a passage in the winter season, when the communication between Revel and Helsingfors is only one over the ice. The usual promenades the Neva in sledges have failed this year, ice and snow being wanting.

PRUSSIA.

BERLIN.—The Chamber of representatives was on the 2nd engaged with the discussion on the chapter of the war budget, which increases the number of the officers of the army. The ministers assured the deputies that the organization of the landwehr should not be modified without the consent of the Chambers. This declaration of General de Bonin was received with loud marks of satisfaction.

The Princess Frederick William has associated herself with other ladies of the highest rank, to establish an asylum for governesses who may be temporarily out of employment. This experiment has commenced on a small scale. A fund of 2,000 thalers being all that was required to make a beginning, the Princess at once contributed 500 thalers.

SPAIN.

MADRID.—The journals of the 2nd contain no political news. The Chamber of Deputies had decided that the subvention to the railway to the Portuguese frontier should be increased. Prince Adalbert of Bavaria had left Madrid to visit the province of Murcia; and the Prussian minister had taken his departure for Berlin.

PORTUGAL.

LISBON.—We learn by telegram via Madrid that the Portuguese Cortes had been dissolved.

ITALY.

PIEDMONT.—A Turin despatch says:—"The return of Count de Cavour gave rise to an imposing demonstration, showing the confidence and calmness of the people, who received the Minister with cries of "Long live the King!" "Long live Cavour!" "Long live Italy!" "Long live France!" Letters from Rome, Florence, and other cities in Italy announce that the amount of numerous subscriptions has been sent to Piedmont for the volunteers."

CENTRAL ITALY.—Letters state very positively that Austria has asked for loans from all the Italian princes whom she considers her federators. The Archduke Maximilin d'Este has responded to the appeal, by an advance of 20,000,000 of swanzigers—nearly the whole of his fortune.—His nephew, the reigning Duke of Modena, Francis V., lies six millions, and the Molza family one million and a half, beside an equal sum which they will advance under the guarantee of the Grand Duke. It is not yet known what subscriptions will be made by the King of Naples and the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

NAPLES.—advices have been received to the 2nd inst. The strength of the King is continually declining, and the news of his Majesty's condition has caused a fall of 4 francs in the public funds. Since the commencement of this year the fall has been 10 francs.

The Queen has dispatched Prince Carini on a diplomatic mission to Berlin.

The armaments are still going on and three vessels have left Naples laden with shot for Sicily. The troops garrisoning the citadel of Syracuse have recently been reinforced.

The Archduke Constantine of Russia is in an awkward position just now, the Court of Naples standing aloof, and he himself being indisposed to give any sign of adhesion to the principle on which that part of Italy is governed. He is known to see none but the men of the future, the reformers of abuse in all departments of the State, and his departure is prayed for by the retrogrades.

TURKEY AND THE EAST.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—The journals and letters to the 25th ult. state that Ali Pacha the Grand Vizier, had entered on a state of convalescence, but that a retirement from the fatigues of office for two or three months would be necessary to ensure his entire recovery. Ali Pacha had expressed a wish to resign, but the sultan would not consent, and Fuad Pacha will continue the ad interim direction of the affairs of the Grand Vizier's post. The news of the intended meeting of a congress was received with great satisfaction in the Turkish capital, where serious fears of a European war had been at one time entertained.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.—A letter from Paris of the 5th, states that the conferences on the affairs of the Danubian Principalities will open on Thursday next. There will be two sittings only, both of which will be occupied with the consideration of Prince Couza's election, who will, it is said, be acknowledged by all the Powers. The discussion of the Danube navigation questions is to be deferred to some future period.

WEST INDIA AND MEXICO.

The Parana has arrived with the West India and Mexican Mails. Her dates are—Vera Cruz, March 6; Jamaica, 12; St. Thomas, 19.

Troops were leaving Kingston in Jamaica for Savannah la Mar, to quell a disturbance which has arisen in consequence of the heavy turnpike tolls in that district.

Another revolution had been attempted in Venezuela, Tamora having taken possession of Core, and hoisted the banner of Federation. Public opinion was unfavorable towards him.

The report of the Ouseley treaty having been ratified by Nicaragua is confirmed.—Sir Gore has also entered into a Postal convention. A special treaty relative to the Mosquito Protectorate has been submitted by Sir G. Ouseley to the Government.

The news from Chili is unfavourable to the present Government. Business is at a stagnant state. The blockade of the ports of Ecudor still continues.

AUSTRALIA.

MELBOURNE.—Papers, dated February 12, have been received per Overland Mail.

The chief political event had been the statement by Mr. O'Shanassy, before the Legislative Assembly, of the principles of the New Land Bill proposed by the Government. Large areas are to be preserved for free selection limited to half a square mile, and the price £1 per acre. Agricultural municipalities are to be formed, with a view to local improvements. Town and valuable agricultural lands are to be sold by auction as formerly. The other most salient features of the measure are comparatively unimportant.

The Parliament was shortly to be prorogued, previous to its dissolution.

The returns of gold by escort, from the various diggings, since the commencement of the current year, show an aggregate amount larger than that returned during the same period of 1858. The average returns for January are 42,152 oz. weekly against 39,401 oz. in January 1858.—This increase, though small, and extending over but a short period, is satisfactory.

A new field of fair promise has been lately opened up on the south side of the Dandenong Rangers, and little over forty miles from Melbourne.

"The gold," says the Argus, "is found within two or three feet of the surface, and is of a nuggetty character, indicating the existence of large deposits in the neighbourhood. As these ranges are densly covered with timber and scrub, exploration is very difficult, as no idea can be formed for some time as to the extent of this new gold field. Water is very abundant, and so apparently is gold, which has been found in remunerative quantity in every part of the ground yet tried. From the shallowness of the sinking, and the nearness of the locality to Melbourne, these are especially what we require just now—good poor man's diggings—and it is very much to be hoped that they may prove extensive."

NEW SOUTH WALES.

The steam postal question has occupied the attention of both Houses at Sydney.—The result appears to be that both are dissatisfied with the arrangements that have been made binding at home, in respect of the route per Suez, without any reference to the line via Panama.

The Church State Aid question will form a feature in the hustings speeches which are impending.

A Female Crusoe.

The superiority of truth to fiction in all the elements of romance is so frequently illustrated by what may be termed common experience that one scarcely thinks of calling attention to a tithe of the strange incidents that are reported in the columns of the daily press. It is a very extraordinary case, indeed, that now-a-days attracts the special notice of the journalist. One such instance, however, has just attracted our attention which is too remarkable to be allowed to pass without notice. In the Chicago Correspondence of the N. Y. Times we read the other day a romance in real life which fairly eclipses all similar romances since the days of Alexander Selkirk. Our correspondent in the Garden City has had the rare good luck to fall in with a real live Crusoe, the only difference being that of sex. The interesting castaway in this case is a young lady, two and twenty years of age, of "pleasant expression, if not positively handsome," and though arrayed, when the writer saw her, in garments that were "anything but fashionable and elegant," and her hands roughened and browned with exposure and toil, yet evidently an educated and intelligent young lady." She had just returned from a three years' involuntary residence on an uninhabited island in the north-west of Lake Superior. The correspondent of the Times happened to be at Racine, Wisconsin, on the day when she arrived on board the schooner Ozelle. His "old and valued friend," Captain Martin, master of the vessel, introduced him to the heroine, Miss Sophia Richardson by name, formerly of Cleveland, Ohio; and from her lips he obtained the absorbing narrative which, related for the most part in her own words, forms such an attractive feature in the Times.

The island on which the fair Crusoe enjoyed her three years' retirement is described as lying to the north-west of Isle Royal, and about twenty-five miles from the British coast. Her time was chiefly occupied in fishing and writing a diary. She built a hut for herself, had plenty to eat, had comfortable warm clothing, and seems upon the whole to have enjoyed a jolly time of it away from the miseries of civilization. Her creature comforts were abundant and varied. She had plenty of buffalo robes to keep her warm in the first instance, and the morning after her arrival, on waking rather sharp set, as the traveller is apt to do in those bracing regions, the first thing she espied on the beach was a box labelled "Sardines." Lucky Crusoe, to fall in with such a treasure! and a big wooden box, too, containing a number of tin ones.—Then there came rolling ashore no end of stores of all kinds, including dry-goods, hardware and provisions, and at length the bodies of the drowned mariners, in the pockets of one of whom she providentially found a box of lucifer matches, which somehow or other had escaped getting wet. The inventory of the supplies for her three years' residence is quite a curiosity. "I found," says our Crusoe, "that I had eight barrels of pork, two kegs of lard, twelve barrels of flour, two of sugar, several boxes of candy, candles, raisins, and dried herrings, my box of sardines, another bale of buffalo robes, a box of dry goods, needles, pins, thread, yarn, &c., a box of mixing batchets, a box of heavy clothing, and a bale of blankets." Well done, Crusoe! Everything exactly in proper proportion, and omitting the candy, for which the heroine had doubtless acquired an affection in childhood that she had not yet entirely lost.

The man Friday was alone wanting to make the little arrangement complete. The monarch of all she surveyed would seem not to have wearied of her solitude, for she made no attempt to reach the mainland, which was only 25 miles distant, and is visible much further off, though the narrative seems to have been written under a contrary impression. At length, however, a party of Indians arrived on the 25th of February last, having crossed "partly on the ice, and partly in their canoes." They conveyed her to a French trading post, whence she was forwarded to Fort William. There she was treated with hospitality by "the commander," who, as soon as the navigation opened sent her to Marquette, and from that place she was conveyed on board the Ozelle to Racine, where the correspondent of the Times made her acquaintance on the 14th inst.

Of course there is sufficient probability on the face of this story to justify any rational person in the presumption that it is true. Everything is in its proper place, particularly the sardines, the lucifer matches, and the "universal" bale of buffalo robes! It is a pity that such a reasonable sort of story should turn out a fiction. There was a veritable Andrew Selkirk at the bottom of Defoe's romance, but we much fear there is no foundation for the romance in the New York Times. What leads us to think so is the terrible liberties that are taken with the geography of the lakes in the course of the narrative. The storm commences at night at the Great Manitoulin Island, and the ship is wrecked next day near Isle Royal. Now, in the first place, the distance between these two places is about 500 miles, the one being in Lake Huron, and the other at the north-western extremity of Lake Superior; while between the lakes there is a river of considerable length, and a canal with gates which would interpose some obstruction to a ship driving before a gale of wind. Then there is no French trading posts in that country, no "commander" at Fort William, but only a solitary Hudson Bay trader, and the navigation has certainly not been open so long as to allow of passengers coming down by vessels from the head of Lake Superior this spring, nor was it open ere at the date when the Times' correspondent wrote. Our neighbour of a most palpable hoax that entirely casts into the shade the famous canard about bowie-knives and revolvers in Georgia which our contemporary's London namesake gave to the world a year or two ago, with more excuse for its credulity than the New York Times can plead in this instance.—Scottish American.

Count Cavour on the Conduct of Austria.

The London papers contain an important despatch addressed by Count Cavour to the Marquis D'Azeglio, and dated Turin, March 17. It is in reply to a note by Sir James Hudson, who asks in the name of the Government if Sardinia would be disposed to follow the example of Austria, and to declare in a formal manner (as Count Buol, on his part, declared Austria's intention not to attack Piedmont, in his despatch to Count Appony of the 25th January) that Sardinia has no intention of attacking her powerful neighbour. Count Cavour says:—

"Appreciating the motives which have inspired such a course on the part of the Cabinet of St. James's we do not hesitate to answer him with the most perfect frankness, as we have done a few days since when he asked us to draw up a memorandum, clear and precise, of the complaints of Italy against Austria, and to indicate the means of applying a remedy. In pursuance of aggressive acts (what other name can we give them?) committed by Austria by the concentration of imposing forces on the Sardinian frontier; by placing on a war footing the army of Italy; by the construction and occupation of new fortifications on ground which does not belong to her; by the occupation of the Legations; and by the violation of treaties, the Government of the King, according to the law of nations, has a right to prepare to defend herself against Austria even by means of arms.—England implicitly acknowledged such a right when, a short time since, through the medium of her Minister of Foreign Affairs—by the weight of her great authority, by the solemn means of diplomatic action—she condemned the unjust measures employed by Austria in sequestering the estates of Sardinian subjects, and agreed that if under such circumstances the dangers of war were prevented, it resulted from the great moderation of the Sardinian Government. Accordingly as her Britanic Majesty's Government has acknowledged the abnormal state of Italy, and promised to Sardinia that England would endeavour to find a remedy for the evils complained of the Sardinian Government, availing itself of such promises, and reserving its liberty of action in case Austria should abstain for the future from committing aggressive acts, Sardinia is ready to give her assurance that it is not her intention to attack Austria; and she agrees on this subject to make a declaration the same as that contained in the despatch of Count Buol, which, in reality, is nothing but a long and bitter accusation against Sardinia and the politics of the Cabinet over which I have the honour to preside."

Count Cavour goes on to show that the military preparations of Sardinia had not been made till Austria had ordered her Italian army to be placed on a war footing, and proceeds to say:—

"Count Buol, after having rapidly examined, from his point of view, the events which have succeeded each other since 1848, finishes by declaring that if Italy is profoundly agitated, if the people are discontented, if the Government have done nothing to satisfy the legitimate desires of their subjects, this all originates in the views and spirit of turbulence which liberty has developed in Piedmont; in fact, saying myself of Count Buol's words, "Through the introduction in that country (Piedmont) of institutions which work well when they have been developed and matured by ages, but which do not seem to be in accordance with the genius, traditions, and social condition of Italy." Count Buol also points out, as a principal remedy to such a state of things (the gravity of which he does not attempt to hide), the untrammelled action of the great Powers to be exercised with the object of modifying the institutions of Piedmont, Lombardy, Venice, and the other states of the Peninsula, would become again tranquil. Without admitting such a conclusion, and being convinced that the destruction of the Liberal institutions of Piedmont, instead of restoring tranquillity—the Italians being reduced to despair—the result in revolution, still we do not hesitate to acknowledge there is much truth in the thought which inspired this part of the despatch of the Austrian Minister. The contrast presented by Piedmont with the provinces under the dominion of Austria is too striking not to produce a profound irritation in Austria. The example of Piedmont proving, contrary to the assertion of Count Buol, that the Italians are susceptible of a liberal and progressive regime, makes the military system of Austria more hateful to the people of the Italian Peninsula. The corporal punishments, plus ever augmenting taxation, the fatal financial measures, and the abandonment to the clergy of the rights of the State, make the contrast more obvious. We acknowledge therefore, that the liberty of Piedmont is a danger and a menace for Austria. According to Austria there are only two things to be—(entre) the liberal institutions of Italy or keep up her dominion over all Italy to prevent contagion from spreading over the other States of the peninsula which have not enough strength at their disposal for suppressing the voice of the people. It is the second alternative which Austria has embraced, waiting the later arrival, and indirect action, the explanation of the first indicated means.

"Austria, up to the present moment has succeeded by secret treaties with Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, and by the indefinite occupation of the Romagna (which is not now about to cease, according to the declarations of Vienna and Rome), and by the considerable fortifications she has so constructed, as making her self mistress of Central Italy, and thus binding Piedmont with a circle of iron. It is against such a state of things, which is not justified by the treaties of Vienna, that Sardinia has not ceased to protest for many years, calling for the intervention and support of the great Powers who signed the treaties of 1815. Such a state of things has for a long time constituted a threatening danger to Piedmont, aggravated of late by extraordinary armaments and other aggressive acts on the part of Austria which have forced the Government of the King to adopt defensive measures and call the contingents under arms.

"It is proposed that this state of things should cease; that Austrian dominion in Italy should enter within the limits formally stipulated by treaties; that Austria should disarm, and that Sardinia, whilst deploring the unhappy fate of the population on the other side of Ticino, should confine her efforts, as England has recommended her to do, towards a pacific propaganda calculated more and more to enlighten public opinion in Europe on the Italian question and to prepare the elements for a future solution. But so long as our neighbors group round them and against us all the States of Italy which border on us, and whilst they can freely march their troops on the banks of the Po and up to the Apennines; so long as they can hold Piacenza (transformed into a fortress of the first order), continually threatening our frontier, it will be impossible for us to remain defenceless in the face of the provoking and armed attitude of Austria.

"The Government of Her Britanic Majesty is too enlightened and too loyal not to admit that we cannot pursue any other line of conduct without betraying our rights, without offending our honour, whatever may be our desire to dissipate the clouds which threaten the peace of the world.

"I request you, M. le Marquis, to read and give a copy of this despatch to Lord Malmesbury, and I avail myself, &c.

(Signed) "CAVOUR."

PERSECUTION IN FRANCE.—The Emperor's rule in his own dominions has

Arrival of the "Bremen."

New York, Sunday, May 1.

The steamship Bremen arrived to-day, from Bremen and Southampton on the 19th ult.

The aspect of European political affairs remains unchanged.

The Ministerial statement, in relation thereto, was made in both Houses of Parliament on the 19th ult.

All parties in England had agreed to take their stand on the treaties of 1815.

The prorogation was to take place on the 19th ult.

France was about to raise a loan of nine millions.

Consols closed on the 18th at 94¾ for money; 94¾ a 95 for account. The discount market was inactive and transactions had been effected at a fraction below a bank minimum. Cotton unaltered. Breadstuffs steady. Provisions steady. Sugar steady. Coffee quiet.

The statement made by Lord Malmesbury says that it was a matter of regret that Lord Cowley had not been allowed a longer time to mediate, as there would have been more chance of a successful result than at present. The Ministry could not, however, refuse the proposal made by Russia for a congress. The five powers agreed to the stipulation that the treaties of 1815 should be left undisturbed, but subsequently collateral questions arose as to the composition of the Congress and the disarmament of the Powers antagonistic to each other. The latter, he regretted to say, had not been settled. It was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that disarmament was necessary previous to the assembling of Congress. It was his opinion that it would be much better to submit this point to a commission of army officers than the Congress, that the Congress might have only political subjects to consider.

Sardinia had only been invited to disarm but refused, on the ground of her non-admission to the Congress.

Some remarks were made by Lord Clarendon and Lord Derby, the former stating that no party spirit would prevent him from making every allowance for the difficulty of the subject, and that he only should be too glad to hear of its success; and the latter stating that, in case of war, which God forbid, the position of England must be one of armed neutrality.

In the Commons, Mr. D'Israeli made a similar statement to Lord Malmesbury.

Lord Palmerston thought the congress might meet at once and settle the real questions upon which the peace of Europe depended. Let France and Austria withdraw their troops from Central Italy, and pledge themselves that at no future time shall they return. The Congress might then if it pleased, go into the question of amelioration of Italy in general.

Lord John Russell coincided with Lord Palmerston. He thought it would be conducive to the interests of peace to admit Sardinia to the Congress.

Steamboat Explosion at San Francisco.

On Sunday morning, the 3rd inst., at about half-past nine o'clock, the ferry boat Contra Costa, plying between San Francisco and Oakland, burst her boiler, causing the death of six persons and the injury of a large number of others. The disaster was unquestionably the result of racing. There are two ferry lines in operation between San Francisco and Oakland, and the spirit of opposition and rivalry ran high between them. On the morning in question several hundreds of the citizens were on board, purposing to spend the Sabbath in the country. Each company started their boat from this side at the same moment, and the racing commenced across the bay. It should be said that such had often occurred before, and that at least one-half of the passengers on board on this occasion were females.

Mr. Benjamin F. Hilliard, one of the injured furnishes the Herald with these particulars:—"At one hundred yards from the wharf the Contra Costa was going at full speed, which showed that they had a high head of steam on. The Oakland soon followed, and the race became exciting. On reaching Oakland Bar, Mr. Hilliard remarked to Mr. Birdsall, the engineer of the Contra Costa, that the Oakland would probably beat them to which Mr. Birdsall replied that he thought so too. He then said to Mr. Hilliard, "One of the firemen is away from his post, and I wish you would hail him and tell him to return." Mr. Hilliard complied and hailed the fireman twice but received no answer—just then the boiler exploded. In passing the steam gauge to comply with the request of the engineer Mr. Hilliard noticed that it marked forty pounds, but was visibly rising with rapidity and went suddenly up to sixty pounds.—Mr. Birdsall, the engineer, immediately "slowed down," but it is thought the fireman, being away from his post, had allowed the water to get too low on the boiler, and when the engineer "slowed down" the steam generated with intense rapidity and caused the explosion."

When intelligence was disseminated of the disaster, the excitement throughout the city was intense. Thousands of persons hurried to the wharves to learn the particulars.—The Contra Costa could be seen lying on the bar, her smoke stack and wheelhouses gone. The Oakland was near by, taking off passengers. Soon after two steamboats proceeded to the spot, one of which towed the wreck of the Contra Costa to San Francisco.

The ladies on board after the disaster displayed unexampled courage. With a very few exceptions, they preserved their presence of mind, and displayed less terror than the men.

Gleanings from old Authors.

As no book has been oftener reprinted than the Bible, none has been so liable to error. Modern editions are comparatively immaculate; but many of the earlier copies swarm with "egregious, blasphemous and damnable errata," according to a good bishop of the seventeenth century.

A German printer's wife, some two hundred years ago, made an alteration in a form of the Bible, then being printed in her husband's office. Wishing to avoid the appearance of subjection passed upon Eve, she took out the first part between of the word Isha and substituted man in place—thus altering the sentence from "and he shall be thy lord" [here] on "and she shall be thy lord" [sorry] It is said she paid for this intentional blunder with her life.

In 1653, Barker & Lucas, King's printers, issued an edition of the Bible, in which the negative particle of the seventh commandment was omitted, so that it read: "Thou shalt commit adultry." For this offence the Star Chamber inflicted a fine of three thousand pounds.

Chevalier tells a curious story of Robert Chaguin, who was so disgusted with the numerous errors in the first edition of his History of France, that he resolved to have a better one published. But the second edition was equally deformed with errors, and he expressed a very natural wish to have the whole lot copies in his chamber, that he might burn them. It is a very fair illustration of going further and faring worse.

In the sixteenth century was printed a thin octavo of 172 pages, the "Anatomy of the Mass, accompanied by an errata of 17 pages. The author a pious monk, informs the reader that the devil (the identical Beelzebub, and not his humble typographical namesake), seeking to ruin his work, used two very malicious frauds. Imprimis: The devil drenched the manuscript in a flood, reducing the writing to a most pitiable state and rendering much of it illegible. Secundus: By diabolical instigation, he maligned the printers to commit blunders unequalled for numbers and importance in so small a work. To combat these infernal machinations, he was obliged to re-peruse the work, and make a list of corrections—all of which he explains in the preface to his errata.

An extraordinary circumstance is mentioned by the Baron de Grimm in his memoirs, of an irritable French author who died in a fit of anger—in consequence of a favourite work, which he had revised with great care, having been printed with three hundred errors—half of which had been made by the corrector of the press.

A Portuguese nobleman who was a great admirer of Camoens, as well as an amateur in typography, engaged the celebrated Didot to print an edition of The Lusiad.—No expense of money or labor was spared: the edition was printed in a superbly style; but—miserable dictu—there was an error in the first term.

Newspapers were not unknown to the Romans. Julius Cæsar introduced the regulation of writing and publishing all the Acts or state occurrences of both Senate and people. The Laws were engraved on brass tablets, permanently fixed in the public places.

The idea was improved by the people. Cicero, at his villa in Tusculum, published a daily newspaper (or more properly a bulletin) in which was given the news of the day—births, marriages, and deaths, fashionable arrivals, &c.—in the most improved modern style.

Petronius has given a specimen of the Acta Diurna, giving account of a birth, an execution and a fire—all of which are despatched in the curtest manner. The reports [actuary] had no opportunity to indulge in strong adjectives and expletive.

The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table has given his version of a Roman reporter, in a very choice phrase, to which we refer our readers.

And they had their Posters, too, as the exhumed inscriptions of Pompeii prove. Inscriptions in red chalk answered for type and paper. Thus: "Julius Proculus will have an auction of his superfluous goods, to pay his debts."

Every Man a Known Soldier.

Though a parliamentary commission has sat to decide upon the best means of obtaining recruits or the army, and making that branch of the national service more acceptable to the labour and intelligence of the country, they have not been able to get over the difficulty presented by the low rate of payment they are compelled from economy, to adopt, and the very slight inducements they have to offer in the shape of rewards and honours. The fighting-man with the exception of the Dorsetshire peasant, is, perhaps the lowest paid labourer in the kingdom; and yet his cost in the mass, amounts to something considerable. A thousand men will consume twenty-five thousand pounds of the country's money every year, and this irrespective of barrack accomodation, stores and ordnance. Little as we like, in this country, to nourish a dissatisfied standing army, our six millions under these heads amounts to one-seventh of the national outlay. Small as our present offensive and defensive force may be, it consumes nearly five per cent. (assuming the general taxation to be equably distributed) of the yearling income of the country. Double this force in numbers or render it doubly as efficient by a rate of pay that will command a stronger and better seasoned race of men, and it is not difficult to see that we should double the already ungrateful outlay. The soldier useful and absolutely necessary in time of war is the most unpopular member of the community in time peace. He is idle and unproductive, ornamental in appearance, and dissipated in habits—a public-house brawler, and a foe to respectable neighbourhoods. Wherever a metropolitan barracks is established, there follows a general depreciation of household property, the rapid growth of small beer shops, or the rapid development of the existing arrangements, to say nothing of that large army of female camp followers who imitate all the vices of war without having the excuse afforded by its excitement. If any one fancies this picture exaggerated, let him pass an evening in and about Knightsbridge, and satisfy himself of the truth or falsehood of the description.

Such being the normal condition of our standing army in time of peace, it is not difficult to account for its unpopularity, apart from the consideration of its expense, and the constitutional theories which condemn it. The soldier is a necessary evil of the State, the product to some extent, of the insane rivalry of nations, or the dishonest ambitions of those who are, for the time being, the nations' rulers. He is a substitute for man whose time is too valuable, or whose inclinations is averse to encounter the dangers, inconveniences, and glories, of the tented-field, or to undertake the permanent guardianship of the national honour and property. Despise him, abuse him, begrudge him his pay as much as we will, we are conscious that we cannot do without him, and the only way to diminish his numbers, and to render ourselves, for all purposes of defence, less dependent upon the services, is for every grown man to make himself familiar with arms and military discipline. This is already done in Prussia, even without much loss of valuable time to men whose ordinary occupations are highly lucrative; for no labourer is always at his labour, and the art of soldiering is as agreeable and healthy, or may be made so, as cricketing, rowing, or any other out-door and athletic diversion. Thousands of men have attained a certain excellence in games of skill, who might have been well-trained soldiers, if their ingenuity and spare industry had been turned in a military direction.

There can be no two opinions about the importance of having every man familiarised with the use of arms, and accustomed to act in concert with companions, and the only difficulty appears to be how to bring this desirable state of things about, without interfering with the jealously guarded liberty of the subject.

The duty of providing every facility for exercise and organization certainly falls upon the Government, and when such means are found ready to hand, there will be no lack of able bodied amateur soldiers ready to avail themselves of them. The volunteer corps that we now have flourishing as many of them may be throughout the country—are their better than exclusive, expensive clubs, beyond the reach of the majority of the people. By popularising these bodies, by widening their sphere of usefulness, and by giving proper encouragement to field exercises, a permanent and inexpensive army, of training men may always be kept ready for home defence, as a powerful wall of strength, to resist the third and last step the teachings of pestilential state-stingers. —Times.

CANADIAN NEWS.

We understand that it is the intention of the Government to offer a reward for the apprehension of Lolar, the murderer of Dunlop on the Hamilton and Port Dover Railway.

EARLY CLOSING OF SALOONS ON SATURDAY NIGHT.—In the Toronto City Council on Tuesday, Councillor Stirling, in reply to Ald. Dunn, stated that the Committee on Licenses had not the requisite authority to enforce the law regarding the closing of taverns at seven o'clock on Saturday night.

TRADE OF CHATHAM.—The Planet says, something of a correct idea of the large trade carried on between this and other ports upon the different Lakes, may be formed from the fact that as we write these lines [Saturday morning] no less than nine schooners, brigs and sloops, and three steamboats, are lying at our docks taking on board cargoes of different descriptions, for Eastern Cities.

A Young Whale.

On Thursday evening last two young lads while fishing in the river, about half a mile from where it empties into the bay, succeeded in capturing with a grappling hook a sturgeon, which, from its immense size, may well be termed a young whale. It measured six feet and four inches in length, and weighed one hundred and twenty pounds. It is not often fish of such prodigious size are taken in these waters.—Belleville Independent.

Marine Disasters.

Several disasters have recently occurred in the Straits of Mackinaw. A schooner from Chicago to Kingston, with nearly eleven thousand bushels of corn, went ashore a few days since, and was subsequently abandoned. Another schooner from Chicago, bound for Oswego, with 1,000 barrels of flour and 12,000 bushels of wheat, has also been wrecked, and it is thought she is a total loss. Several other vessels have sustained damage.

Melancholy and Fatal Accident.

On Sunday afternoon, a boy named Wilkinson met a melancholy fate in the yard adjoining St. George's Church, in Montreal. An old chimney, which has been standing since the burning of the building, ten years ago, fell into the yard, where Wilkinson happened to be at the time with some other children, and, falling upon him, crushed him so severely that after removal to the General Hospital, he died in one hour.

Where Over was Born.

Robert Over, the murderer of Lancelot Adams, the mail carrier, was born in Lurgburgh, Virginia; is twenty-nine years of age. His father is a Spaniard, and is supposed to be living at present in the state of Pensylvania, his mother [is alive,] is now living in one of the West India Islands—At the time Over made his escape from slavery, two of his brothers were shot, and himself badly wounded in the head. He lived for some time when first he came to Canada, in South Dumfries. A few months since, he was imprisoned in the Hamilton jail.

The Prospects of the Year.

It cannot have escaped the attentive observer that business of all kinds in Canada is gradually but surely working its way out of the cloud of difficulties that has beset it for the last couple of years, and that we may speedily look for a return of prosperous times. Gradually our merchants and manufacturers are again extending their respective businesses, and although great difficulty is still felt, owing to the scarcity of money, confidence is being rapidly re-established, and we have undoubtedly passed through the worst of our troubles. A lesson has been taught our business men by the late crisis, which will also have a good effect in future; and over-speculation and rash trading, such as took place during 1855 and '56, will in future be avoided as the whirl-pool from which there is no escape. The wheat crop for 1859 promises as yet exceedingly well, and all danger from the winter is now past. A great breadth of this staple production is also sown this year and the hopes of many of our farmers are centred in the acres of beautiful looking wheat that surround their homes. With a season of even comparative plenty to the farmer, we should soon see a revival in the monetary markets of the Province, and with a good harvest, a steady trade, and confidence once more established, we trust we will not be far wrong in predicting a prosperous season for the close of 1859.—Gult Reporter.

Jealousy and Murder.

A most brutal murder was perpetrated in the bush on the Brock road, on Saturday night last. The particulars of the dreadful tragedy are briefly as follow:—The murderer, John McGaffery, was employed in chopping wood for a clergyman, near Morristown, and his wife was in the habit of accompanying him to his work, and assisting him to pile the wood. On saturday, the man, his wife and son, the latter a boy of about 14 years of age, took dinner together in the bush. Shortly after finishing the meal, McGaffery sent the lad away to procure some tea and sugar. On his return his father was gone, and he found his mother lying on her face. The lad spoke to her, and receiving no answer became alarmed, and ran to a place about a quarter of a mile distant, where a man named Parks was making shingles. On being informed of the woman's condition, Parks immediately accompanied the boy back to the scene of the murder, where he found the unfortunate woman quite dead. Yesterday the murderer gave himself up and made a confession before a magistrate. He confessed himself guilty of the murder, and stated that he and his wife, Mary Magaffery, sat down on a pile of wood where he had been chopping; that he asked her to tell him who it was got out of the bed from her on Friday night; she told him but denied that the man had connected with her; deponent then caught her by the throat and threw her down, telling her that she must state the truth; she said if he would let her up she would tell him all about; tell him all about the matter; she got up and repeated what she had already told him, whereupon he again knocked her down and struck her on the head with a stick of cordwood.

And inquest was subsequently held before Dr. Hewitt, at Morristown, and after a careful investigation into all the circumstances connected with the case, the Jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against John McGaffery. The prisoner has been committed to await his trial at the assizes.—Guelph Herald.

Arrival of the NORTH BRITON.

THE WAR FEELING STILL PREVALENT.

QUEBEC, May 2.

The North Briton passed Riviere du Loup at 7 o'clock, p. m., yesterday, and reached Quebec at 4 a. m. this morning, with 180 passengers.

The Niagara reached Liverpool at noon on the 18th.

The Ministerial statement of affairs in Europe, made in Parliament on the 18th, by Lord Malmesbury, in the Lords, and Mr. Disraeli in the Commons, gave a history of the negotiations, adding but little to that already known. Lord Cowley returned from Vienna with a proposition calculate to maintain peace, but in the meantime Russia had proposed and France accepted a Congress. The British Government acquiesced, and proposed a general disarmament before Congress. France and Austria assented to the principle, but Sardinia refused, on the ground of her exclusion from the Congress. The Italian States are to be admitted when her presence may be required. They concluded by expressing their hopes of peace, stating that the Government had done their utmost to preserve it. Lord Derby said matters had almost reached that point when England should declare that she had done all in her power, and withdrew from further interference, leaving the responsibility on other powers.

Lord Palmerston said that Sardinia ought to be admitted. If not, she was justified in refusing to disarm. He rather ridiculed the idea of the general disarmament. The great question was the evacuation of Central Italy. He thought Congress should meet forthwith and solve the difficulty.

Lord John Russell concurred with Lord Palmerston.

The Ministers generally showed a leaning towards Austria, and the press charges them with offering provocations to France.

Preparations continue in France, and the Emperor simply ask delay to perfect projects.

Sardinia's official reply on England's request that she would disarm, states that her exclusion from the Congress forbids such an engagement. She offers, however, not to arm reserves or mobilize her army or more troops from defensive positions, provided Austria sends no more men into Lombardy.

Prussia gives signs of supporting Austria.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The debate is variously criticized by the Press and Austrian proclivities evinced by ministers are strongly protested against.

The Daily News says that Lord Derby has done his best to involve England in war with France; he has done all but promised Austria that in this war under certain contingencies, she shall see British forces fighting on her side.

It is asserted that the British garrisons in the Mediterranean are to be promptly reinforced, and that troops returning from India will be employed in that service.

A boiler exploded in the spinning mill of Messrs. Edwards, at Dundee, and a large number of operators, chiefly women, were buried in the ruins, and about twenty were taken out dead, and others were more or less injured.

Two Haytian envoys had an audience with Queen Victoria, to announce the establishment of a republic in Hayti.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur publishes an account of an extensive movement of cavalry, not usual at this period of the year.

The Times' Paris correspondent writes that the resolution of the Tuileries is reported to be this: leaving to Congress the care of settling the question of general disarming as concerning Austria and France. The Emperor advises Piedmont to disarm previous to meeting of Congress, on condition that Piedmont shall be admitted to deliberate and vote in Congress. If this be accepted there ought to be pacific solution; if not the alternative is war.

Paris letters reiterate a statement that France requires some time yet for preparation, and that consequently Napoleon seeks excuses for delay.

Active preparations were going in Toulon dockyard.

The rumors that Count Persigny had gone on a peaceful mission to London is contradicted, and it is asserted on the contrary that a breach existed between the Emperor and Persigny.

There is a talk of forming a camp in the plains of Ambrieu instead of at Calog.

There is no change for the better in commercial affairs. Flour was firmer at Paris, and wheat steady. Wine and brandy have slightly risen, in consequence of the vines having suffered from the frost.

It is asserted that before France concurred in the principle for simultaneous disarmament she was asked for a categorial answer to the demand, under the threat if such answer was not given in a certain time Austria would consider it equivalent to a declaration of war, and forthwith act against Piedmont.

PRUSSIA.

The London Times says, it appears that Prussia is about to contract a loan equal to between eight and nine million pounds sterling. This will be likely to absorb the means of Berlin capitalists and cause them at the first convenient moment to throw upon the London market any portion of the Russian loan to which they may have committed themselves.

A despatch to the Independance Belge asserts that the Arch-Duke Albert had succeeded in his mission to Berlin—that is Prussia agrees to support the Austrian proposition, though still continuing to maintain for the present her position as meditating power.

Several political prisoners, who had been in confinement for the last ten years, had been liberated, but without any formal amnesty. The movement, however, is not general.

Indian Finance

An important practical question for Englishmen desirous of saving their hard earnings from the rude grasp of the tax-gatherer is, what shall we do with India? Popular imagination sparkles with jewels and glitters with gold at the bare mention of the name, and long trains of elephants, peacock thrones, gorgeously caparisoned horses, and State umbrellas, float in splendid profusion through the bewildered mind. Much of this is true. India is an El Dorado for native grandees and lucky European officials. The Civil Service is a road to fortune, while the military expenditure is so lavish as to make war a luxurious amusement, rather than a stern, hard-featured trade. Times will, indeed, occur when the officer must forego his accustomed pomps and vanities, expose his precious person to the glaring sun, and quench his thirst in a healthier beverage than iced champagne, while the common soldier must contribute to carry his own knapsack or cook his own dinner; but these are circumstances which politicians in rife, and a prospect of rising in the world has, before now, caused hungers to be quaffed in defiance of a 'jolly fever,' or a 'bloody' campaign."

Sometimes we are informed that that typical magnificence is necessary to impose upon the native mind, and win submission to our rule, but this story may now be told to the marines, for Sir Charles Napier proved that a great general trotting forth with one towel and a piece of soap could, by force of mind, fill a larger space in the native eye than a common place governor-general, with a train long enough to reach from Buckingham Palace to Stratford Church. What the natives really do worship is power, and they know that can walk about in plain clothes.

A deficiency of £10,000,000 or more, with a precarious state of the opium revenue, and a complete smash of a Government scheme of "raising the wind" by ill-advised Treasury bills, may make us tolerably certain that unless economy be rapidly enforced, and a good plan of taxation established in India, we shall have to bear an annual burden of no small amount; and is by no means encouraging to find the Horse Guards keeping up an enormous army greatly beyond the real wants of the country, and sending out swarms of "nice young men," belonging to "genteel families" to enjoy staff appointments, and sing in chorus over their wine cups the frozen-out gardeners' song, "We have no work to do, oo, oo."

Of taxation proper India knows little enough, for the chief item of revenue—the land tax—is, in fact, no tax at all, but a rent, and every village contains wealthy merchants and money lenders making enormous profits out of the peasantry, and contributing next to nothing to the burdens of the State. Our course has been uniformly that of abolishing the imposts which native rulers used to enact, and substituting nothing in their place. We admit that the native taxation was in the highest degree vexatious and calculated to impede industry but somehow or other, the people were as thriving under it, as they have been since we introduced our more enlightened views. Those who know Indian life are convinced that additional taxation could be levied without proving burdensome, and if an efficient police were established, the peasants would gain in security more than they lost by the new imposts we should call upon them to pay. It is impossible that India can afford to lavish more than twenty millions a-year upon soldiers, and the safety of the country would be compatible with a large reduction of military force, provided it were replaced by a far less costly and less numerous police.

If Indian expenditure continue to exceed revenue, and the deficit is made good by loans taken up in our market, a positive inducement will be created to throw off our yoke, and thus escape paying the interest upon our augmenting debt.

Like all other orientals, our Indian fellow-subjects are greater hoards; and if confidence in the financial, as well as in the political stability of our Eastern empire could be restored, the wealthy natives might be induced to purchase a considerable quantity of Treasury paper made practically convertible by being taken at any time in payment of any State contribution.

But whatever the details of wise finance measures may be, the English public should insist upon being relieved from a continuous drain. With good government, India might be made useful to this country, opening each year fresh markets for our merchants and manufacturers, a new means of employment for working-men; but with a continuation of blundering and Eastern extravagance, our Indian Empire will signify an additional income tax, or some such incubus, upon the nation's pockets.—Times.

Miscellaneous Items.

Seasonable Thoughts.

How sacredly God has regulated and guarded both the marriage and family relations, in their purity and peace, by the solemn requirements and sanctions of His Holy Word! Since the family society is the origin of all civil society; and since it is there that children are to be mainly educated and prepared to become members of the commonwealth; it was of the utmost importance that the purity of marriage and the good order of home should be secured in the highest degree. For here, in our homes, are the interests of man concentrated. All the struggles in the political world—all the care and energy of business life about which so much is heard, are, after all, but designed to guard more wisely and securely our homes, and to supply them with peace, plenty, and permanent joy. And, however untoward the outward and stirring affairs of a people may go for a time, if our homes are still kept sacred in their design and influence, the nation will and must be safe and prosperous in the end.

But if the home institution becomes demoralized and powerless, for its deep-laid inwrought, conservative functions, then in that sad hour, is the school, the church, and every social and civil instruction on which a nation may rely, palsied and rendered utterly worthless. The pillars of society are undermined and broken; and the decaying superstructurers of government and education fall into dilapidation, or crumble to pieces as in the republics of South America. Hence the repeated and solemn regulations and sanctions which God in the Scripture throws around the marriage covenant, and the right ordering of the domestic household.

Purity and virtue, not only of conduct, but of thought and feeling, are required, on the peril of losing the favor of God and the glories of heaven. Children are sacredly bound to obey their parents in the Lord.—Our Saviour, confirming the law, said, "For God commanded, saying, Honor thy father and thy mother; and he that curseth father or mother, let him die the death." Fathers are required not to "provoke their children to wrath, but to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Love constant and unchangeable love, is enjoined upon husbands and wives towards each other as the basis, and the only allowable basis of the beginning and continuance of the marriage, and the family relations.

Thus carefully has God instituted, guarded, and preserved to us our homes, with all their resultant stores of quiet, but deep and permanent bliss. With more than a father's love and constant care, though all the long years, has he been rearing the mansion, arranging and furnishing the varied apartments, transplanting the trees of Paradise with their luscious fruits, and adorning the walks with flowers and shade—all, that we, his much loved children, may have here in our pilgrimage, a little heavenly, domestic home for the heart.

Truly "God setteth the solitary in families." And for this as the source of, and channel for, all our other blessings, even the sacred Sabbaths, are the first finally called upon to-day, to "sing unto God, sing praises to his name, and rejoice before him;" saying "Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation."—Morning.

Hairs of the Head Numbered.

The Medical Times says:—A German account has taken the trouble to count the number of hairs existing in four heads of hair, of different colours. He found in a blond, 140,409 distinct hairs; in a brown, 109,440; in a black, 102,960; and in a red, 88,740.

To Prevent the Toothache.

Rub well the teeth and gums with a toothbrush every night on going to bed, using the flowers of sulphur. This is an excellent preservative to the teeth, and void of any unpleasant smell.

The Growing Wheat Crop.

The N. Y. Herald collects accounts of the growing wheat crop, from the leading papers of the great wheat producing States all of which affirm that the prospect for a large yield was never better. The Herald says that "the crop has so far advanced, and the rains throughout the country have been so abundant, that we can have little reason to fear that either a general drought or insects can henceforth destroy the present general prospect of a harvest greatly exceeding the one of last year. Upon this good and glorious promise we congratulate the American people, producers and consumers, and the world at large. An abundant wheat harvest will enable our producers, especially of the great West, to clear themselves of the pressure of the financial embarrassments of the late revulsion; and to our consumers an abundance bread is never a very distressing inconvenience.

Preventive for the Potato Rot.

Take 4 bushels of dry common house ashes, 2 bushels of roach lime, (slacked), 6 pounds of sulphur: Mix and sow over the potatoes, before the dew rises in the morning, to an acre and one half of land. This preventive must be sown between the 19th and 22nd of July, and for late potatoes from the 19th to the 23rd of August, and if attended to you will find it a perfect preventive.

The yellow and large red onion are the best for a general crop. The ground for Onions should be well prepared, by digging in plenty of well rotted manure. The seed may be sown from the middle of April to the middle of May. Sow in drills one inch deep and twelve inches apart. When the young Onions are up thin them out to the distance of three inches apart.

Take your own Paper.

We hold every one derelict in his duty that does not take his own county paper. It is a duty you owe to the editor who has embarked his means to establish a paper among you. He should be supported, and well, too. Everybody should take his paper and that without bargaining that he should lend you all the magazines he receives as a bonus.

Ministerial Difficulties.

A clergyman in a mining village not far from Ricarton, in the course of his pastoral visits, called at the domicile of a collier in his parish. Inquiring at the woman he saw and whom he presumed to be the wife, if her husband was at home, she answered—"Deed na, sir, he's at his wark." "Is your husband, my good woman, a communicant?"—"A communicant—he's naething o this kind—he's just a collier." Astonished at the ignorance displayed, the clergyman could not avoid ejaculating, "Oh, what darkness!" The collier's spouse, understanding the language literally, not figuratively, was also something astonished.—"Darkness! little ye ken o't; had ye been here afore we got that extra window in the gable, ye would scarcely hae been able to see your finger afore you." The pastor sighed; it was his first visitation of his flock, and their ignorance certainly demanded his prayers. "I must my good woman, put up a petition for you here." "Petition! petition!—bide awee; nae petitions will be put up here sae lang as I am in the house; but at the term we're gaun owre to Newbigging's, and then ye may just put up as many o' them as ye like."

Self-culture.

It is our business to cultivate in our minds to rear to the utmost vigor and maturity every sort of generous and honest feeling that belongs to our nature. To bring the dispositions that are lovely in private life into the service and conduct of the commonwealth; and, as patriots not to forget we are gentlemen. To cultivate friendships, and not to incur enmities. To be fully persuaded that all virtue which is impracticable is spurious; and rather to run the risk of falling into faults in a course which leads us to act with effect and energy than to loiter out our days without blame and without use. He trespasses against his duty who sleeps upon his watches as well as he that goeth over to his enemy.—Burke.

A Bill for Farmers.

Mr. Roblin has introduced a bill into Parliament that will probably become law. It is called a bill to provide a standard weight for certain roots, seeds, &c.

I. From and after the passing of this Act the following weights shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be, the standard weights which in all cases shall be allowed to be equal to the Winchester bushel, namely:—

	lbs.
Potatoes, turnips, parsnips, beets and onions	56
Flax seed	46
Blue grass seed	14
Castor beans	40
Salt	56
Dried apples	24
Dried peaches	33
Hemp seed	44

II. Upon any sale and delivery of any of the articles in this Act mentioned, and in every contract which shall be made after the passing of this Act for the sale and delivery of any of the said articles, the bushel shall be taken and intended to mean the weight of bushel as regulated by this Act, and not a bushel in measure or according to a greater or less weight, unless the contrary shall appear to have been agreed upon by the parties.

SCENE—ASHRIDGE.

Enter Gloster.

GLOSTER—Now is the summer of our prosperity,
Made dismal winter by bad crops;
And all the profits of our Societies
In the deep pockets of defaulters buried;
And now instead of fat Secretaryships,
We are to our petty wills exiled.
But tho' so wanting of fair proportion
That dogs bark at me as I pass by them,
Plots have I laid, injurious dangerous
By legal quibbles, tricks, pretexts,
To set our Township Council and the people
In deadly enmity the one against the other;
And if our Councillors be as true and just
As I am subtle and abusive,
Then quickly shall they their offices resign,
And I of Asphodel the Reeve shall be.

Enter Clarence and 4 others.

Brother good day; what means this sad
Tent accompany your grace?

CLARENCE—These are four most plant tools,
To do our bidding as a Council,
Should the law, (that compound
Of great and glorious uncertainties),
Confer success upon our intrigue
To obtain the rule and power
Over Asphodel and its fair revenue.

GLOSTER—But methinks I have often seen
Three of these discarded by the people;
The fourth a stranger to the country is,
They will a very curious Council make,
But must do, if no better can be found.

CLARENCE, (cogently)—It ill befits you so to speak
Of non-acceptance or incompetency,
Have not you as oft as they
On first or second day resigned;
Had I, as was requested of me
Made known the jolly state
A few minutes before I closed it,
As in duty I was bound to do,
Then yourself this year had not been A Councillor.

GLOSTER—Most gracious brother, I pray you
To inform me yet more fully
The several qualities of these our friends.

CLARENCE—The stranger is a most useful friend
As he has means of getting information
Concerning the true Council movements;
This tall fair man has often plead
To serve on any Council for the daily pay;
This handsome dark-haired Celtic man
Has a very goodly farm, wherewith
If defeated, we may pay the lawyers;
This fourth man has a countenance
Would scare the spirits from the vasty deep,
But he is the most pliant tool of all.
Besides these four, I have yet another
And if possible a yet more useful tool,
"The man of many words," who lately strove
To win the people's minds against you,
But I by threatening his dismissal from
My court, have so subdued him,
That he will do our dirty work;
Tho' his threats were the more effectual
From the fact that 'twas illegally
He held his post there'n since last November.

GLOSTER—I thank thee, Clarence, for so wisely choosing
Coadjutors fitting to our petty intrigues.
Come forward now, thou man of words
And thou of the ill-favored countenance
And say what ye will do to serve our ends.

CATESBY—Humbly I beseech your lordship's pardon,
For that my struggling conscience lately held me
To turn the people's hearts against you;
For acting so, I do much reproach myself,
Therefore again I come to do your bidding,
As this many years I have been wont to do.
Methought that in the County's Council
I had no striven for your eastern neighbours weal,
To my constituent's cost and detriment,
That it were useless for me to mingle more
With Asphodel's good people,—except it were
To warn them 'gainst like practices in you;
But as I cannot legally profit by these acts
And at same time in great Clarences' Court
My office hold, I will retain the latter
And do your several biddings, aye even should
Of my reputation, lose the little now is left me.

TYRRELL—Most mighty liege; brave champions
For your own private profit; I now appear
To offer ye my services. I with my voice
Will scare the Councillors, with my teeth
Will I affright them. If then immediately
Their seats they do not evacuate,
I on the Township will raise again intrude,
But make my anvil ring with very rage.

GLOSTER—Most worthy fr ends,
Your proffered services accepted are,
Our brother Clarence, and ourselves
Will a private consultation hold,
At which we will prepare for each
Such work as best is for such minds,
Then at your peril you are wanting found.
To our high commands, aye even should they
With your ancient namesakes make you equal.

Agricultural.

Preparation for next Crops.

As the live stock of Canada has of late years been increasing in quality, and, in most districts, improving in quality, the still most ancient of suitable provender, becomes a question of great moment to every farmer; since the mixed system of husbandry, or the breeding of stock and the raising of grain, is the one universally prevailing in this country. The main object of the farmer is to produce the largest amount of grain, and sustain the greatest number of animals of the best quality, that his farm will allow, without diminishing, but rather increasing, the natural and permanent productiveness of the soil.

With a view of increasing and improving the domesticated animals of the farm, it has been found requisite in the British Islands, whose soil and climate are so peculiarly adapted to the production of grass and a rich permanent pasturage, to cultivate the various kinds of root crops upon a scale of great magnitude. And it is to the production of an ample supply of nutritious food of different varieties that we may look for an explanation of the immense numbers of farm animals, and their superior excellence, which characterize the agriculture of Great Britain and Ireland. Previous to the introduction of the turnip, beet, carrot, &c., into field culture, both the amount and quality of live-stock were very different to the present state of things. The same seasons are equally applicable here. Neither our heavy crops, no artificial or permanent pastures are of such a character as to support large flocks and herds, without the aid of vegetables cultivated in the best manner and on a commensurate scale. Our farmers are beginning to understand that it must be a losing business to go to the trouble and expense of importing or breeding improved stock, without providing for them a sufficient amount of food of the best quality; and experience has determined that a mixture, consisting of hay, roots and grain, is the one far best adapted to meet the demand of this new and improved order of things.

The season has now arrived when active preparations must be made to secure these objects. It is generally to be recommended to plough land intended for root crops, deeply in the fall, and to prevent the stagnation of water upon the surface either by underdraining or surface furrows, the former being incomparably the best. Give the land a thorough draining as early in the spring as its state will admit, always bearing in mind that for fine seeds especially, the ground should never be touched while in a wet state; a rule which applies with increased force to all kinds of heavy and retentive soils. The thorough mechanical preparation of the land for root crops, or indeed for all others, is a matter of primary importance, affecting the growth and amount of the crop in a variety of ways.

The next consideration is the adaptation of the soil to a special object in what may be termed a chemical point of view; or in other words the supplying of crops with the necessary kind and amount of food which they require. This brings us at once to the all-important question of manures. And here it may be observed that it will only end in loss and disappointment to attempt the raising of roots, for the purpose of cattle feeding, without first bringing the soil into a suitable condition, first by deep and clean cultivation; and second, by the application of manures, in kind and quantity adapted to the requirements of the crop, and the actual condition of the soil. Farm yard dung, unless thoroughly decomposed, which state generally involves a great loss of manuring constituents, should be evenly spread over the surface and well incorporated with the soil. Bone-dust, guano, and the fine artificial manures, are generally best applied in the drills with the seed, taking care that guano, for instance, does not come in direct contact with the seed, as its germination might thereby be weakened or entirely prevented.

Cucumbers may be sown in the open ground any time in May. They require a good rich soil. Sow in hills four feet apart leaving only three plants on each hill. The cucumber and melon vines are liable to be attacked by a yellow fly or bug. Soot, charcoal dust, and soap suds, applied to the plants, will assist in keeping them off.

$100 A YEAR.
AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S
CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 18 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.
All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.
PRICES.
All orders directed as "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.
The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.
Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."
N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1858.
Peterborough, April 21st, 1859. 16

BOOTS & SHOES

THE SUBSCRIBERS beg to inform the public customers of Mr. Thomas Russell, and the public in general, that they have entered into partnership, and have made arrangements with him to succeed him in his business. They therefore beg to assure all who favor them with their custom, that their wants will be punctually attended to, and their work done in a manner that will ensure satisfaction. They will always be found ready to receive orders, and they hope by such liberality in their business to receive a share of the public patronage.
All kinds of rough made work kept constantly on hand, and sold on the most reasonable terms for Cash or short approved credit.
Remember the old stand opposite the Western entrance to the Town Hall.

F. G. CALLENDER,
Surgical and Mechanical Dentist,

KNOWN to the inhabitants of Peterborough and vicinity, for the past 12 years, intimates that he will continue to visit Peterboro', on the first Monday in each month, for the week, prepared to perform all operations of the profession, in defiance of competition as to neatness and durability, (except using tooth with platina, it being a substance not then used by the profession.) He is also prepared to insert Teeth on Vulcanized Rubber, a much approved new style, being free from taste, much cheaper than Gold, and is said to be equal in neatness and durability, and much more agreeable in the mouth, being less weighty.
Public attention is invited to the above. Rooms over Mr. Clinton's Store.

SALE OF SLAVES.

We condense from the N. Y. Tribune an account of a sale of slaves which took place near Savannah, Georgia, recently. It conveys a faint idea of the horrors of Slavery:—

"The lot consisted of four hundred and thirty-six men, women, children, and infants, being that half of the negro stock remaining on the old Major Butler plantations which fell to one of the two heirs to that estate. Major Butler, dying, left a property valued at more than a million of dollars, the major part of which was invested in rice and cotton plantations, and the slaves thereon all of which immense fortune descended to two heirs, his sons, Mr. John A. Butler, some time deceased, and Mr. Pierce M. Butler still living, and resident in the city of Philadelphia, in the Free State of Pennsylvania. Losses in the grand crash of 1757-8, and other exigencies of business, have compelled the latter gentleman to realize on his Southern investments that he may satisfy his pressing creditors. This necessity led to a partition of the negro stock on the Georgia plantations, between himself and the representative of the other heir, the widow of the late John A. Butler, and the negroes that were brought to the hammer last week were the property of Mr. Pierce M. Butler, of Philadelphia, and were, in fact, sold to pay Mr. Pierce M. Butler's debts. The creditors were represented by General Cadwallader, while Mr. Butler was present in person, attended by his business agent, to attend to his own interests. The sale had been advertised largely for many weeks, though the name of Mr. Butler was not mentioned, and as the negroes were known to be a choice lot, and very desirable property, the attendance of buyers was large. The breaking up of an old family estate was so uncommon an occurrance that the affair was regarded with unusual interest throughout the South. For several days before the sale every hotel in Savannah was crowded with negro speculators from North and South Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Alabama and Louisiana, who had been attracted hither by the prospects of making good bargains. Nothing was heard for days in the bar-rooms and public rooms but talk of the great sale, criticisms of the business affairs of Mr. Butler, and speculations as to the probable prices the stock would bring. The office of Joseph Bryan, the negro-broker who had the management of the sale, was thronged every day by eager inquiries in search of information, and by some who were anxious to buy but were uncertain as to whether the securities would prove acceptable. Little parties were made up from the various hotels every day to visit the Race-course, distant some three miles from the city, to look over the chattels, discuss the points, and make memoranda for guidance on the day of sale. The buyers were generally of a rough breed, slangy, profane, an Ishmaelish, being for the most part from the black river and swamp plantations, where the elegancies of polite life are not, perhaps developed to their fullest extent. In fact, the humanities are sadly neglected by the petty tyrants of the rice-fields that border the great Dismal Swamp, their knowledge of the luxuries of our best society comprehending only revolvers and kindred delicacies."

"The negroes came from two plantations, the one a rice plantation, near Darie, the State of Georgia, not far from the great Okefenokee Swamp, and the other a cotton plantation, on the extreme northern point of St. Simon's Island, a little it ofa an island in the Atlantic cut off from Georgia mainland by a slender arm of the sea.

"Though the most of the stock had been accustomed only to rice and cotton planting, there were among them a number of very passable mechanics, who had been taught to do all the rougher sorts of mechanical work on the plantations. There were coopers, carpenters, shoemakers, and blacksmiths, each one equal in his various craft to the ordinary requirements of a plantation; thus, the coopers could make rice-tierces, and, possibly, on a pinch, rude tubs, and buckets; the carpenter could do the rough carpentery about the negro-quarters; the shoemaker could make shoes of the fashion required for the slaves; and the blacksmith was adequate to the manufacture of hoes and similar simple tools, and to such trifling repairs in the blacksmithing way as did not require too refined a skill. Though probably, no one of all these would be called a superior, or even an average workman, among the masters of the craft, their knowledge of these various trades sold in some cases for nearly as much as the man—that is, a man without a trade who would be valued at $900 would readily bring 1600 or 1700 dols. if he was a reasonable blacksmith or cooper."

"There was no light mulattoes in the whole lot of the Butler stock, and but very few that were even a shade removed from the original Congo blackness.

"They have been little defiled by the admixture of degenerate Anglo-Saxon blood, and, for the most part, could boast that they were of as pure a breed as the the best blood of Spain—a point in their favour in the eyes of the buyer as well as physiologically, for the liberal infusion of the blood of the dominant race brings a larger intelligence, a more vigorous brain, which, soon, grows restless under the yoke and is prone to inquire into the definition of the word liberty, and the meaning of the starry flag which waves, as you may have heard, o'er the land of the free. The pure-blooded negroes are much more docile and manageable than mulattoes, though less quick of comprehension, which makes them preferred by drivers, who can stimulate stupidity much easier than they can control intelligence by the lash."

None of the Butler slaves had ever been sold before but had been on these two plantations since they were born. On their arrival at Savannah they were taken to the Race-course, and there quartered in the sheds erected for the accommodation of the horses and carriages of gentlemen attending the races. Into these sheds they were huddled pell-mell, without any more attention to their comfort than was necessary to prevent their becoming ill and unsaleable. Each "family" had one or more boxes or bunkers in which were stowed such scanty articles of their clothing as were not brought into immediate requisition, and their tin dishes and gourds for their food and drink.

The slaves remained at the Race-course, some of them for more than a week, and all of them for four days, before the sale.—They were brought in thus early that buyers who desired to inspect them might enjoy that privilege, although none of them were sold at private sale. For these preliminary days the shed was constantly visited by spectators. The negroes were examined with as little consideration as if they had been brutes indeed; the buyers pulling their mouths open to see their teeth, pinching their limbs to see how muscular they were, walking them up and down to detect any signs of lameness, making them stoop and bend in different ways that they might be certain there was no concealed rupture or wound; and, in addition to all this asking them scores of questions relative to their qualifications and accomplishments. All these humiliations were submitted to without a murmur, and, in some instances with good-natured cheerfulness—where the slave liked the appearance of the proposed buyer, and fancied that he might prove a kind "master." The following curiously sad scene is the type of a score of others that were there enacted;—

"'Elisha,' chattel No. 5 in the catalogue had taken a fancy to a benevolent looking middle-aged, gentleman who was inspecting the stock, and thus used his powers of persuasion to induce the benevolent man to purchase him, his wife, boy, and girl, Molly, Israel, Sevanda, chattels, No. 6, 7, and 8. The earnestness with which the poor fellow pressed his suit, knowing as he did, that perhaps the happiness of his whole life depended on his success, was touching, and the arguments he used were most pathetic. He made no appeal to the feelings of the buyer; he rested no hope on his charity and kindness, but only strove to show how well worth his dollars were the bone and blood he was entreating him to buy. 'Look at me, mas'r; am prime rice-pla ter; sho' you won't find a better man dan me; no better on de whole plantation; not a bit old I got; do mo' work dan ever; do carpenter work, too, little; better buy me, mas'r; I'se he good servant, mas'r. Molly, too, my wife, Sa, fus rate rice hand; was as good me. Stan' out yer Moll, and let the gen'lm'n see." Molly advances, with her hands crossed on her breast, and makes a quick, short curtsy, and stands mute looking appealingly at the benevolent man's face—But Elisha talks all the faster. "Show mas'r yer arm, Molly; good arm dat, mas'r; she do a heap of work mo' with dat arm yet Come out yer, Israel, walk aroun' an' let the gen'lm'n see how spry you be. Then pointing to the three-year-old girl, who stood with her chubby hand to her mouth, holding on to her mother's dress, and uncertain what to make of the strange scene,—'Little Sanly's only a chile yet; make prime gal by-and-by. Better buy us, mas'r, we'n fus rate bargain;' and so on. But the benevolent gentleman found where he could drive a closer bargain, and so bought somebody else."

Similar scenes were transacting all the while on every side—parents praising the strength and cleverness of their children, and showing off every muscle and sinew to the very best advantage, and with the excusable pride of other parents, but to make them the more desirable in the eyes of the man-buyer; and, on the other hand, children extenuating and mitigating the age and inability of parents, that they might be more marketable and full, if possible, into his hands. Not unfrequently these representations if borne out by the facts, secured a purchaser. The women never spoke to the white men unless spoken to, and then made the conference as short as possible.—And not one of them all, during the whole time they were thus exposed to the rude questions of vulgar men, spoke the least unwomanly or indelicate word, or conducted herself in any regard otherwise than a modest woman should do; their conversation and demeanor were quite as unexceptionable as they would have been had they been the highest ladies in the land, and, though all the insults to which they were subjected they conducted themselves with the most perfect decorum and self-respect. The sentiment of the subjoined characteristic dialogue was heard more than once repeated.

"'Well, Colonel, I seen you looking sharp at shoemaker Bill's Sally. Going to buy her?' 'Well, Major, I think not.—Sally's a good, big strapping gal, and can do a heap o' work; but its five years since she has had any children. She's done breeding I reckon.'?

"The expression of the faces of all who stepped on the block was always the same and told of more anguish than it is in the power of words to express. Blighted homes, crushed hopes, and broken hearts, was the sad story to be read in all the anxious faces. Some of them regarded the sale with perfect indifference, never making a motion save to turn from one side to the other at the word of the dapper Mr. Bryan, that all the crowd might have a fair view of their proportions, and then, when the sale was accomplished, stepping down from the block without caring to cast even a look at the buyer, who now held all their happiness in his hands. Others, again, strained their eyes with eager glances from one buyer to another as the bidding went on, trying with earnest attention to follow the rapid voice of the auctioneer. Sometimes, two persons only would be bidding for the same chattel, all the others having resigned the contest, and then the poor creature on the block, conceiving no intermediate preference for one of the buyers over the other, would regard the rivalry with the interest interest, the expression of his face changing with every bid, settling into a half smile of joy if his favorite buyer persevered unto the end, and assumed the property, and settling down into a look of hopeless despair if the other won the victory."

Machinery for Shoemaking.

An extensive strike has existed for some time amongst the shoemakers in Staffordshire, in consequence of the introduction of machinery in the manufacture of boots and shoes. The Staffordshire Advertiser, in noticing the strike says:—"We were this morning shown a boot made entirely by machinery, the soles being sprigged on and securely fastened by a machine invented for the purpose. This specimen of workmanship is tolerably well executed; and as the machine becomes more fully developed and adapted to its particular work, it will no doubt produce goods of a vastly superior quality. Another machine has also been invented which, by an ingenious contrivance, fastens the bottoms and heels on by means of brass screws, the soles possessing the same elasticity as those made up in the ordinary way by manual labour. The application of these machines to the manufacture of boots and shoes will undoubtedly produce a complete revolution in the boot and shoe trade, and a largely increased production will enable enterprising persons to extend, to an almost unlimited degree, the export trade in this necessary article of daily use. It must not be supposed, however, that these machines will supersede the necessity for manual labour; but must be united in order to suit the tastes and supply the demands of all classes."

The Sultan's New Son-in-Law.

The promised marriage of Fatima Sultana, the widow of Ali (Ghalib Pacha (recently drowned in the Bosphorus) to Noury Bey (now Pasha), one of the chamberlains of the sultan, took place on Monday week, when the religious part of the ceremony was privately performed at the Palace. The Imperial firman raising the dignity of Musheer was publicly read at the Porte, with the usual ceremonial, on the previous Saturday. The new son-in-law is only seventeen years of age.

The Reward of Clemency.

INDIA.—To-day at 2 o'clock, the Chief Commissioner held a small durbar, or court, at his house, for the purpose of bestowing on Hurdeo Bux the honours with which he had been invested by the Supreme Government of India for his service in saving the lives of the Fettyghur fugitives, and in assisting us at a later period of the mutinies. Hurdeo Bux is a very tall, well-built man, standing upwards of six feet high, with square, broad shoulders. His features are regular, and of a very resolute expression, and his manners are dignified and graceful. He was dressed in rich robes brocaded with gold, and in cloth of gold over-coat, like a herald's tabar, open in front, with a sirwi turban on his head, and cotton socks on his feet. Two of his retinue, equally well dressed, were seated on his right.—Lower down on chairs, on the Commissioners left, were placed the Kupperthalla Rajah and his brother, brocaded and gilt richly in gala dress. While the ceremony was taking place a very remarkable likeness to the best Jack Falstaff ever realised by painter or actor—He must Ali—made his appearance, and was accommodated with an ample chair, which made a decided protest against his enormous burden. I had imagined that such fair round paunches could only be lined by English capons, but Hurdeo Ali, who is a hale strong fellow, who walks erect with firm tread, could challenge any corporate body in the United Kingdom.

All the durbar rose till the Commissioner and Hurdeo Bux were seated. Mr. Montgomery then in English explained that he was about to confer on Hurdeo Bux the title of Rajah, which, with a jaghire, or estate in fee, valued £1,500 per annum, and a khut of 21 pieces, was the reward of his fidelity and of his protection to British subjects. Then, addressing the Hurdeo Bux in Hindostanee, the Commissioner said that, by orders of the Governor General, he was directed to place in his hands the patent of peerage by which he became a Rajah, and the titles to landed estates worth 15 000r. per annum, as well as to present him with a khut of honor. The newly-made Rajah listened to all Mr. Montgomery said, and once only did he speak, when he seemed to intimate that he had only done what was right in saving the lives of helpless people. When the sunnud which was fairly written on gold embossed paper, stamped with a great seal, which left the words "Supreme Government of India" in white on a black ground, was placed in his hand, he bowed slightly, and handed it to his secretary. He repeated the acknowledgment and the act in the same quiet way when the grant of land was given to him. Then the khut was brought in, a file of servants in gold and red liveries bringing in trays, on which were placed, first, a very handsome, showy frontlet for the turban, consisting of rose diamonds with large emerald pendant over the forehead, value nearly £1000; two diamond bracelets, trays of cloth of gold, brocaded stuffs, shawls of Umritsir, scarfs, turban bands, &c. As they were too large to be brought in, the very handsome Arab horse and the elephant, with their magnificent housing and appointments of scarlet embroidered with gold, a silver howdah, and gold headstalls, remained outside. I observed that the newly-made Rajah never cast a glance at the various trays as they were presented, though he apparently, in spite of himself, looked down for an instant at the diamonds. When all the presents had been laid on the carpet, so that it was a blaze of fine colour, Mr. Forsyth, taking up the ornaments, fixed them on the Rajah's turban, where they shone and sparkled right gloriously. Then the Rajah's servants brought in a bag of coin as a nuzzur, and placed it at Mr. Montgomery's feet. A few quite complimentary speeches, and the durbar was broken up by the Chief Commissioner, who led the Rajah out to the steps of the porch. There he bade him good by, and Hurdeo Bux ascended the pile of his elephant into his silver howdah, and rode off with his followers, and, with the beautiful Bombay Arab by his side, neighing and chafing on the bit, took his departure radiant with gems and pleasure.

Foreign Policy of the Derby Government.

It was not without reason that we anticipated the Derby Government would give the question of foreign policy the precedence to that of Reform in their appeal to the constituencies at the general election. The Ministerial statements made in both Houses of Parliament on the eve of prorogation may be regarded as intended to supply what was left out in the formal addresses to the electors and in the speech from the throne with which the session was closed. The Reform question is entirely ignored, and considerations of national policy with reference to the impending war take its place. It was not expedient, of course, that either in the Queen's Speech or in the addresses to the electors explicit reference should be made to a subject which involves so much danger, and thus far may be said to be involved in some uncertainty. But yet the Ministry have not failed to express quite distinctly their intended policy in the event of a war which may now be regarded as inevitable. They have taken their position, they may be regarded as having staked their claims to the confidence of the nation.

The statements made in both Houses of Parliament by the leaders of the Government are to be looked on as virtually severing the French alliance and espousing the cause of Austria. There is a definite policy in this, which the Derby-Disraeli party, so long in want of what the author of Coningsby calls "a good cry," will undoubtedly turn to account. It raises an issue on which they and their opponents may go to the country and demand a verdict. Shall Britain [illegible] Austria in maintaining the settlement of 1815, lend its influence to preserve the balance of power in Europe, or by the suppression of its sympathies with Italy shall it countenance practically the successive despotism of Europe. Such is the alternative which the Conservatives put forward. The side for which they have themselves expressed a decided preference is the one which their predecessors of the same school in politics have always adopted and which may also plead the sanction of national preference at every period when the question has arisen. It is true that there now exists a strong sympathy for Italy and a decided feeling against the Austrian policy towards that country. In these feelings the present Ministry profess to participate so far as concerns the relations of Austria to the independent States, if we may so call them, south of Lombardy.—They take their stand simply on the Treaty of Vienna, which does not authorize the intervention of Austria in these States, but which does guarantee to her the possession of Lombardy and Venice. This guarantee was given with a view to erect a barrier against the encroachments of France, which at every ambitious period of her history has attempted to convert the Peninsula into a French province. Who can doubt that it is Louis Napoleon's ambition to do so now! Who believes in the French Emperor as a liberator to any people in whose affairs he is permitted to take an interest? The predominance of French influence in Italy would be simply a transference of the unhappy people from one set of tyrants to another, and the letting in upon Europe of a tide of war which would probably involve all the nations alike. To countenance France, therefore, in its pretended design of liberating and reforming Italy, would simply be to lend the influence of Britain in favour of a war for the aggrandizement of its natural rival.

British sympathy is all very well, but is not of much use if it can only be made available through the instrumentality of Louis Napoleon. To lend any countenance to the officious zeal of the French Emperor in this manner would be carrying the Anglo-French alliance a little too far, to the deepest point of humiliation, indeed, that one nation could possibly submit to at the hands of another. There has been quite enough of that already. In virtue of the alliance France has assumed the position of first Power in Europe, and as such out of fact in all its recent diplomacy it has enjoyed the advantages of that position. What it never could attain permanently by war it was gained by peace, and improved upon with the natural French talent for encroachment, without the correct sense of justice which does in some cases interpose a barrier against ambition. Hitherto this has been manifested in mere trifles. But were Britain to have any part with France in her mediated encroachment on Italy the character and prestige of the nation would be lost in the first instance, and its own turn to suffer from the aggression of its Imperial neighbor would come before long.

These are considerations which must always determine Britain to oppose France in any general European war, to which a contest in Italy would be but the prelude. It is another matter whether it is altogether prudent in Lord Derby's Government to give the indications they have just afforded of their intention, under certain contingencies, to abandon a neutral position. There is a wide-spread impression that there will be no call for Britain to interfere on either side. But once the war becomes general on the Continent it cannot hold back, and it would be permanently fatal to its own interest to do so unless the aggressive side in the contest were manifestly in a fair way of getting worsted. If France gains an advantage over Austria which appears to threaten the existing distribution of power, Britain is committed in self-defence to engage in war, and so thus will doubtless be the issue of the hostilities the probability is that the struggle will not have lasted long before Britain becomes a party to it.

This is the contingent policy that is foreshadowed by the members of the present Government, and we believe it is one to which in the long run the country will give its support if circumstances should seem to justify and require such a move next. A speculative sympathy for Italy will not stand long against the hereditary and well-founded jealousy of France. It is exceedingly doubtful, however, if public feeling is now ripe for a declaration of warlike purpose. Apparently it is not; but on the other hand little reliance is placed on the members of that party whose chiefs so recently fraternized with the French Emperor, and whose policy has been uniformly favourable to his pretensions. The Emperor is said to have recently remarked that he would have got better terms from Lord Palmerston than from Lord Derby. He is doubtless a competent judge of this. But the British public are likely to be of opinion that the best terms for France in such a case would be the worst terms for England and as they will doubtless be disposed to give the preference to Ministers whom they believe to be actuated by a regard for British interests, in place of a personal weakness for French connection or an impracticable sympathy for Italian freedom.—Scottish American.

Baron Bramwell and a Welsh Jury

At the Merionethshire Assizes the following scene took place at the close of a trial:—The Clerk of the Court asked: "Do you find the prisoner, David William, guilty or not guilty?" Foreman: "Not guilty." (Great cheering, which was at once suppressed.) The Judge requested the officer of the Court to bring any one before him whom they saw joining in the applause, and he would send him to prison. His Lordship then addressed the jury as follows:—"Gentlemen, you have said that you find the prisoner not guilty. Do you understand that it is your duty to say whether or not this man received his employers' money and up, first them to his own purposes? Do you say he is not guilty of so doing?—Foreman: "Yes, sir." The Judge (emphatically): "Then I am thankful it is your verdict, and not mine." (Immense.) Addressing Mr. Matthew, the Interpreter, said: "Are you an Englishman, sir?" Mr. Matthew: ("I am, my lord." Judge: "And you have a English. I suppose?" Mr. Matthew: "Yes, my lord." Judge: "This should be a warning to Englishmen not to accept their capital in Wales."

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE WAR QUESTION.

The steamship Glasgow, Capt. Thompson, from Glasgow on the morning of April 20, arrived in New York on Tuesday noon.

She brings newspaper details of the intelligence brought to Quebec by the North Briton, from Liverpool on the same days and thence forwarded by telegraph.

THE SPEECH OF THE QUEEN ON THE PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Parliament was prorogued on the 19th ult., by commission. The Lord Chancellor read her Majesty's speech, which was as follows:—

My Lords and Gentlemen:

We are commanded by our Majesty to inform you that it is her Majesty's intention forthwith to dissolve the present Parliament, with a view to enable her people to express, in the mode described by the Constitution, their opinion on the state of public affairs.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

We are commanded by her Majesty to thank you for the wise liberality with which you have granted the necessary supplies for the military and naval defences of the country, and for the provision which you have made for the exigencies of the other branches of the public service during the interval which must elapse before the estimates for the year can be considered by the new Parliament, which her Majesty will direct to be immediately called.

My Lords and Gentlemen.

Her Majesty commands us to inform you that the appeal which she is about to make to her people has been rendered necessary by the difficulties experienced in carrying on the public business of the country, as indicated by the fact that, within little more than a year, two successive Administrations have failed to retain the confidence of the House of Commons, and her Majesty prays that under the blessing of Divine Providence, the step which she is about to take may have the effect of facilitating the discharge of her high functions, and of enabling her to conduct the government of the country under the advice of a ministry possessed of the confidence of her Parliament and people.

THE WAR QUESTION.

The second edition of the London Herald, of the 19th says—"We are enabled to state that Sardinia has agreed to the general and simultaneous disarmament, preliminary to the Congress. To this disarmament she was invited by France and England, and her adhesion removes the most serious obstacle to peace." According to the advices from Piedmont, the war preparations in that country, as well as in France require some further weeks for active effort for full completion. The London Times, in a leader argues in favour of the formation of a National Guard.

The English garrisons in the Mediterranean will be promptly reinforced. Probably several of the second battalions of regiments serving in India will be employed in this service. The news published in a telegraphic despatch, to the effect that English ships were about to be sent to Trieste is altogether false. Advices received from Rome are to the 16th ult. The departure of volunteers increased rapidly—250 young men left Perouse for Piedmont.

The Moniteur, of April 19, contains an article on the present state of affairs. The different European Powers have expressed themselves on the following four points as the bases of the Congress:—

1. To determine the means by which peace may be maintained between Austria and Piedmont.

The manner in which the evacuation of the States of the Church by the French and Austrian troops may be best effected.

3. Whether it is expedient to introduce reform in the administration of those and the other Italian States, the administration of which may present defects evidently tending to create a permanent and dangerous state of uneasiness and discontent, and what those reforms should be.

4. To substitute for the treaties between Austria and the Italian Duchies, a confederation amongst themselves, of the States of Italy, for their mutual protection as well internal as external. Austria has since demanded the disarming of Sardinia, and then subsequently proposed a general disarmament. England modified Austria's proposal so the sense that it should only be necessary to admit the principle of a general disarmament, reserving the manner of regulating its execution until after the assembling of the Congress. France believes that Piedmont could not be invited to disarm if she is not to be represented at the Congress. The English Government having insisted upon it, France, willing to prove her conciliatory disposition, has proceeded to request Piedmont to disarm, on condition that Piedmont and the other Italian States shall be invited to take part in the Congress. The article goes on to cite historical precedents, and hopes that this proposal will meet with the unanimous consent of the Powers. France has even added that she is disposed to assent to a disarmament previous to the Congress.—Everything therefore, justifies the belief that, even if all difficulties are not yet removed, a definite understanding will ere long be established, and that no further obstacles will oppose the assembling of the Congress.

The Morning Post complains of Ministers' partiality towards Austria, and deprecates the ominous muttering towards the close of Mr. Disraeli's speech, as to the part which England might be called to play in a coming struggle. The Post observes that Ministers are about to go to the country in an inextricable dilemma. There are two great questions at issue—their diplomacy and their reform measure; and on one or other, if not on both, they must incur an inevitable condemnation. "If peace be secured to the Continent, then the cause of domestic reform will assume still greater magnitude, and will attract still more general attention. If, on the other hand, war be yet destined to result, their army of 'Malmesbury and peace' will prove their disgrace. In either case, therefore, the Parliament they are about to convoke must report its definite judgment upon them.

The Morning Herald extols the bold and intelligible foreign policy of Minister, which has met the cordial approval of statesmen of all shades of opinion; for, according to his contemporary, "it was only in minor points of detail, and not in matters of principle, that either Lord Clarendon in the House, or Lord Palmerston in the Lower House, ventured to differ from the views expressed." The Herald argues against the necessity of Cavour for the Congress, but thinks that the disposition to compromise with Austria will prove the chief difficulty. The Chronicle thinks existing circumstances favour the policy of the other.

Advices have been received from Rome to the 16th inst. The departure of volunteers, which had hitherto been inconsiderable, now begins to increase rapidly. Two hundred and fifty young men have left Perouse for Piedmont. An seditious riot took place the day before yesterday among the students of Bologna, and the troops were obliged to fire upon them. It is said that several persons were wounded.

Advices have also been received from Naples to the 16th inst. After a terrible attack of his malady, the King received the sacrament and afterward blessed and bade farewell to his family.

The Newfoundland Fishery Dispute.

From the London Times.

It is just about one hundred years ago that the first Mr. Pitt, in declaiming upon the national interests of Britain, affirmed that one point was of such moment as not to be surrendered, though the enemy were masters of the Tower of London. We shall be thought, perhaps, to be robbing the idea of its grandeur when we proceed to explain that the point so characterized was simply the Newfoundland Fishery, but the inhabitants of that colony would not themselves be willing to make much abatement from the estimate which the great Minister has put on record. In their eyes the Newfoundland Fishery is everything, and everything it certainly is to Newfoundland. What the Eastern trade was to Venice, the spice trade to Amsterdam, and the wine trade to Gascony, the cod and herring fisheries are to Newfoundland. In this country we have now little conception of the extent to which a single pursuit can absorb and monopolize the thoughts and energies of an entire community. The example, it is true, is not a singular one. The Dutch once regarded the fishing trade in a similar light; the New Englanders partake largely of such sentiments to the present day; and there was once a time when the Woolsack represented in the eyes of Englishmen what a fishing-net represents in the eyes of our North American kinsfolk. The prodigious strides of British commerce have now carried it beyond the range of a "staple" for, even our cotton manufactures, immense as they are, do not monopolize the enterprise or capital of the kingdom; but in Newfoundland all the energy and industry of the population are still concentrated on one absorbing profession. The House of Assembly debates about fish, and the Speaker puts the question about fisheries. The "prosperity of the country," and "the condition of the people," are measured by the resort of fish to the coast, the amount of the takes desires to stigmatize the Administration and "embarrass the Government," he asserts—we quote from very recent debates—that "our best fish are taken away by the French and nothing but scrawds and tomcods left for our fishermen."

The subject, however, to which these words refer has recently been invested with immediate international importance. The people of Newfoundland really believe that the French are dipping too largely into their waters, whereas the French declare that they are not left in the enjoyment of the rights secured to them by treaty.—Matters have reached, indeed, such a point that the Commander of the French naval force in those quarters has given formal notice to our authorities that on and after the 5th of next month the French fishermen would be effectually protected in their privileges, and the rights secured to France be rigorously enforced by the imperial cruisers. A counter-notification has, of course, been made in the interest of Great Britain and her colony; but we are happy to state that the two Governments have promptly come to accord respecting a certain proceeding which may possibly terminate a long-pending controversy, and which will certainly obviate the chances of present embroilment. A commission, consisting of two French and two British representatives is to investigate the question this summer by researches and inquiries on the spot, and in the meantime Count Walewski has suggested to Lord Cowley that the Commanders on the proper forbearance into their proceedings. These arrangements, which were accomplished without any difficulty and with every expression of amity and conciliation on the part of the French Government, will, at any rate, place the affair in good train, but whether it will be found to admit of a conclusive or satisfactory solution is a question of great doubt.

One of the chief points at issue between the two countries consists in the claim of the French to certain local rights which they invest with an exclusive character.—Their title to participate in the Newfoundland fisheries, recognized by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, and confirmed by the Treaty of Versailles, 70 years later, was again established after the interruptions of the revolutionary wars, by the settlement of 1814. According to these treaties, they are undoubtedly entitled not only to take fish, but to resort for the purpose of curing and drying these fish to a certain part of the Newfoundland shore during a certain season. It is further stipulated that "in order that the fishermen of the two nations may not give a cause for daily quarrels, his Britannic Majesty will take most positive measures for preventing his subjects for interrupting in any manner, by their competition, the fishery of the French during the temporary exercise of it which was granted to them." These terms the French interpret as conveying a right of fishery, within certain limits, not only free from all disturbance, but from all participation on the part of the British, whereas our own Government has always steadily declined to acknowledge that any such exclusive right, as regarded the actual fishery, were designed to be granted. It is admitted on our side that in practice the French have always been left sole occupiers during the fishing season, of their own parts of the shore, and for the simple reason that two sets of fishermen could not carry on their business of curing and drying at one and the same spot. The French are entitled to that temporary lodgment on the coast, without which their fishery itself could not be conducted, and this lodgment, for plain considerations of convenience, they are allowed to keep to themselves; but when the argument is extended to the waters of the fishery it fails altogether. There the French can fish without interruption, although the British may be fishing too, and the treaty, therefore, is not infringed when our fishermen ply their ordinary trade at that spot, provided always that they do not cause interruption to the vessels of the French. Such is the view of the case taken by our authorities, and maintained by the present Ministry.

It was not therefore without some justification that Count Walewski expressed his doubts to Lord Cowley about the probable success of the proceedings suggested. The difference of the two Governments has arisen on a point of interpretation, and a point of that character can hardly be settled by local inquiries. It will be readily understood, moreover, from the statement we have offered above, that the colony of Newfoundland would be back to the "root of the matter" of its rights should all "subject" of such vital importance to it, and its natural protection in this respect have been relinquished by the Government at home. A dispatch of Mr. Labouchere, dated the 26th of March 1857, to the effect that "the consent of the community of Newfoundland was regarded by her Majesty's Government as the essential preliminary to any modification of their territorial or maritime rights" is quoted in the Colonial Legislature as the Magna Charta of the dependency, and already, indeed, on one occasion, has a convention been nullified by the refusal of the colony to accept its provisions. In the present case an attempt has been made to obviate any ulterior difficulties by placing a direct representative of Newfoundland on the commission itself, and it was with the view, indeed, of finding a place for this nominee, that the proposal of two commissioners on each side, instead of one, was originally entertained by Lord Derby's Government. Possibly this expedient, which has been approved by the Colonial Legislature, may be attended with success, but the tone of opinion in Newfoundland seems so decidedly and so naturally pronounced that we cannot anticipate with much confidence any of that compromising spirit by which delicate agreements are usually preceded. However, the resolutions adopted are as good as the occasion admits, and while they speak distinctly for the amicable sentiments and friendly intentions of the French Government, they entirely reflect credit on Sir E. Lytton's administration of the department he has lately resigned.—The controversy may be hard to settle, but the settlement seems likely to be approached with judicious arrangements and feelings of mutual good will.

Parliament Prorogued.

The Session of Parliament was brought to a close on Wednesday, 4th inst. The next Session will be held in Quebec, prior to the final removal to Ottowa.

War Begun.

By the telegraphed news of the Adelaide we see that war in Europe has really begun. England was making extensive preparations for war, and the whole Continent was in arms. This is the commencement, what will be the end?

The Weather.

The weather—which always affords a prop for broken down conversationalists—has of late exhibited an unwavering attachment to sunshine, and although her lovely face recently was bedewed with tears, in the shape of a refreshing shower, she is now only rendered more fascinating from its cooling influence. April has expired, and glorious May, clad in her habiliments of opening Summer, appears on every side to the best advantage, since "mountain, flood and field" are rendered doubly fascinating from her smiles; while her green mantle which falls as gracefully on the tender blade of grass, as on the outstretched arms of the mightiest chieftain in the forest refreshes the eye as well as cheers the heart of humanity. From all accounts the farmers anticipate an abundant harvest, and we hope the monetary interests of the country will likewise experience a re-action, and that the "sinews of war" which have of late been so difficult to secure, will for the future be more abundant, as generally speaking there is a sad deficiency in every man's exchequer, leaving him often to exclaim—

"He that steals my purse, Steals trash."

DARING ROBBERY—On the evening of Tuesday, 3rd inst., the Peterboro' Baptist Chapel was broken into, and the missionary box with its contents, a number of books, and several other articles stolen. The depredators forcibly entered by one of the Chapel windows, and having obtained entrance to the vestry, broke open a lock-fast press, and committed this sacrilegious outrage. We regret to add that the thieves have as yet escaped detection.

CONCERT.—The lovers of Music will be pleased to learn that Mr. Rackett will give a grand Concert of Vocal and Instrumental music at the Rooms in Scott's Building, on Wednesday evening next. He will be assisted by several well-known professionals. A rich treat may be expected.

THE LECTURE this evening before the Mechanics' Institute, will be delivered by the Rev. J. M. Roger.

TWO MEN DROWNED—Two men who were engaged in running timber on the river were drowned on Tuesday last, by the crib on which they were employed going over the dam at Boswell's Mill. The bodies of the unfortunate men have not yet been found.

We learn from the Montreal Herald that the steamship "United Kingdom" from Glasgow had arrived at that port, being the first one arrival this season. She is an iron ship, and is represented to be an excellent sea boat, capable of accommodating three hundred passengers; 400 troops was her complement, made in the service of the Home Government. The "United Kingdom" is advertised to sail again for Glasgow on the 18th inst.

The sale of the Market Tolls rented to Mr. Andrew Cathcart being the successful competitor.

MR. CONOLLY'S LECTURE—On last Thursday evening we had the pleasure of listening to Mr. T. B. Conolly delivering his lecture in the Town Hall on the "Ups and Downs of Life," and we are free to admit that in point of language, delivery and dramatic effect all that has been said in relation to it by the Kingston Daily News, and British Whig, &c., and that the audience likewise were unanimous in the same opinion, (if we were to judge from their warm expressions of applause.) As a specimen of Mr. Conolly's style we subjoin, with his permission and at our request, the following glowing description, which struck us as being exceedingly happy, eloquent, and original:—

"A man's intellect, be it ever so sublime, avails him nought if he allows its powers to remain inactive; it becomes about as valuable as a farm that yields nothing but thistles, or as a watch of the most finished workmanship, that does not fulfil the end for which it was constructed.—We may talk of genius as we please, and hang enraptured over the pages of a Milton or a Byron, but in this world of vicissitude, subjected as we are to change like the chameleon (and cannot live without it) we'll find it impracticable to subsist alone on beautiful conceptions, or like the animal in question on the atmosphere that surrounds us. Those who have amassed wealth as a general thing, did not make their fortunes in a day, neither have those whose names are immortalized as poets, statesmen, orators, &c., achieved celebrity as such without an effort. "To scorn delights and live laborious days" at the outset is the great secret of rising in this life above the level of mediocrity, and had not Horace Greely acted on this principle, he would not now be the intellectual giant that he is, standing, on the very Olympus of journalism; turning up his nose in scorn at the elegancies of life; with his old white hat, dehapitated coat, and inexpressibles dancing the highland fling over his leathers, an object I say of admiration and surprise to the thinking world. With what a manly and becoming pride may he now look down from his distinguished position, as from the top of the ladder he beholds in imagination, the once poor and friendless boy in the great metropolis, ascending step by step each rung till he mounted eventually, with unshrinking nerve to the summit of his hopes. To him murky ink has proved indeed a sea of glory, and the ample folds of the Tribune's flag, a noble emblem of the victory achieved by mind and resolution over "those twin gaolers of the daring heart" "low birth and iron fortune." A triumph such as this speaks more than volumes of the ups of life, and should inspire each and all with the ambition to go and do likewise. It is no libel on society to say that he kneels as a sycophant at the shrine of Mammon, and that the tide of her affections, ebb and flow in the channel of circumstances. Had not the editor in question emerged from the leaden gloom that surrounded his prospects and been thrown out into bold relief from the foreground of obscurity, the printer's devil could never have entered the aristocratic drawing-rooms of Washington, nor mingled with the elite and snobdom of Saratoga, while his quaint and oftimes seedy toggery, in conjunction with his grotesque and ungainly carriage, would be the most unlikely thing on earth to furnish a subject for either remark or criticism."

The Prorogation.

His Excellency, the Governor General, gave his assent to the following Bills at the close of the Session on Wednesday last:

After which His Excellency was pleased to reserve the following Bill for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon:

An Act for the relief of John McLean.

The Speaker of the Legislative Assembly then presented the Supply Bill, which having also received, the assent of His Excellency, Sir Edmund delivered the following.

SPEECH.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Legislative Council, Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly:

I am glad to be able to fulfil the hope that I held out of releasing you somewhat earlier than usual from our parliamentary labors.

I may, however, congratulate you on having accomplished much useful work in the course of the present session.

The answer of Her Majesty's Secretary of State to my despatch, announcing the final settlement of the question of our Seat of Government has been placed in your hands. You will see that such answer expressed satisfaction on learning your ultimate judgment on this long agitated matter—consistent as such judgment is with the honour and good faith of the Provincial Legislature.

You have made provisions for carrying out fairly to commutation of the Federal Rights in Lower Canada. You have too placed some additional restraints on the power of borrowing conferred by previous Acts on the municipalities, whilst you have taken steps for gradually enforcing the fulfilment of the local obligations already incurred.

In my opinion, nothing could be more injurious to the credit of the Province, and the value of Municipal Governments, than the prevalence of an impression that obligations of this character could be impaired or evaded.

You have had before you the whole mass of correspondence on the matter of the Hudson's Bay territory, and you have expressed by resolutions of your own, your views on this subject.

Your Addresses relating to the Postal Subsidies, and to the duties on Canadian produce shipped from foreign ports have been duly forwarded for the consideration of our gracious Queen.

Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly:

You have amended the Tariff. Whilst I regret the necessity for increasing some of the duties on imports, I hope that the principle on which such duties are imposed will be found to alleviate their pressure. It is satisfactory, to see that the income of the Province for the first quarter of the current year shews signs of the revival of trade, and the increase of our resources.

I have every reason to believe that the arrangements mentioned by you with reference to the public debts will be satisfactorily gone.

I thank you for the Supplies which you have granted for the public service. They shall be expended with economy, and with a strict regard to your wishes.

Honourable Gentlemen, and Gentlemen:

The revision of the Statutes of Upper and United Canada is now accomplished, and the result of their enactment and publication in a new form will be to simplify most materially the law of the whole country.

You have, as a Legislature, solemnly invited Her Majesty and any member of the Royal Family to visit British North America. I believe that there is no portion of Her Majesty's broad dominions in which such a visit would be hailed with the expression of a loyalty more affectionate and more genuine.

With an earnest prayer that Providence may bless us with an abundant harvest, and restore the prosperity of Canada, I now terminate the present Session.

His Excellency now took his departure from the Parliament Buildings at about a quarter to six, and was again greeted with mingled cheers, groans, and hisses. There was a strong body of policemen on the ground, under the command of the Chief and Deputy Chief, but their services were not needed. When the Governor General drove off the guns fired another salute—there was more cheering and hissing—and thus ended the Second Session of the Sixth Parliament of United Canada.

Quebec, May 9.

The Canadian steamship Anglo-Saxon, from Liverpool, April 23th, arrived at this port at an early hour this morning.

The crisis in Europe continues, but as yet there has been no declaration of war.—War was momentarily expected, although it was rumoured that Austria had given Sardinia fourteen days longer in which time to consider her demand.

There was also a rumour that France and Russia had entered into an alliance, offensive and defensive. This announcement, which reached London on Wednesday, caused a panic in the money market, Consols falling on that day upwards of two per cent.

French troops had already crossed the frontier at Sardinia.

A French loan of 500,000,000 francs is announced.

Rebellion in Jamaica.

Recent accounts from Jamaica are of an interesting character. It would seem that the negroes upon that Island are desirous of following the example set by the people of Hayti, and wish to create a government of their own. On the 8th of March several thousand negroes entered Savannah-la-Mar and proceeding to the Court House, drove the Judge from the bench. The correspondent of the New York Herald says—"They were armed with cutlasses, bowie knives, Kentucky axes and bludgeons, and many of them carried shields made for the occasion covered with goat skins, and were the latter material next to their skin. Dozens of the peasantry were seen in the procession that marched into the town with colours flying and drums beating, armed with muskets. It is well known that had the civil power done the least thing to oppose the people, blood would have been shed in profusion, and the torch placed to every building in Savannah-la-Mar, and to every estate in Westmoreland and the surrounding parishes. The people openly declared their intention to take the lives of the white and coloured inhabitants and to burn down their property. They said the Island was theirs, and that they will yet have possession of it, and in proof of this assertion they refer to the manner in which they offended the law on the occasion referred to unmolested by the higher classes. "We have cowed the whites and mulattoes," said they, "they are trash, and Jamaica will soon cease to be the property of these wretches." The names of several magistrates and citizens who with their families were to be attacked were publicly shouted, and several women volunteered to pitch and fire these inoffensive people." After driving Mr. Justice Craigill from his seat, they destroyed a police station, and were proceeding with their work when 200 men of the second West India regiment, and 100 of Royal Artillery arrived and restored quiet. Several of the ringleaders were arrested. A few days after another riot broke out on the Holland estate, which was put down by the police, after a free use of the bayonet. The ringleader is severely injured, and fifty or sixty persons are in custody. In several parts of the Island the torch has been applied, and a general rising of the negroes was apprehended. The correspondent above quoted says:—"Where the spirit which has aroused will end it is hard for me to say: but the general desire is that additional soldiers shall be sent to the Island. With a large military body, things may be well but if the colonies are left to protect themselves, the lower orders will certainly possess themselves of the Island and elect some ignorant negro as their governor in-chief.

More Difficulty with the Mormons.

From the very inception of the contest with the Mormons, a small acquaintance with the facts enabled one to see that the task the United States authorities had assumed was one of no ordinary difficulty.—We refer not to the extent of country which had to be crossed before the Salt Lake could be reached, nor to the physical opposition the troops of the Republic expected to meet with from those they had gone to combat. Time and a sufficient body of men were alone required to overcome all such obstacles. But it was just when they were overcome that the real difficulty commenced. Contrary to expectation Brigham Young did not fight; "our army" entered the promised land in triumph and Governor Cummings was peaceably installed in office. He was placed there by his Government for the purpose of carrying out the laws—the laws are not of the Mormons, but those of the United States. And what has been the result? His authority has been recognized, but beyond that he might as well be in Washington, as in Utah territory. Polygamy reigns unchecked; and atrocities, some the less horrible than those of which we read before he went there, are as numerous as ever. His ordinances are carried out or not as it pleases Brigham Young, and all attempts to enforce the law by constitutional means, are laughed to scorn. True the army is there; and it ought to be good for something, inasmuch as $20,000,000 have been spent in its support already. But if the sword is to be appealed to, one thing alone remains—Mormonism must be drowned in the blood of its devotees. It may be hard receive the fact, but it is a fact nevertheless that the mass of these poor creatures do believe sincerely and firmly in the faith they profess. If such were not the case all difficulty would vanish; and under the protection of the troops, they would repudiate the scoundrel who have deceived them.—So desirable an eventuality, however does not seem likely to be realised. Never was Pope or Emperor obeyed more devotedly than Brigham Young and his filthy priesthood. And Governor Cummings seeing this, endeavours by such means as are left him, to mitigate the evils which he cannot control. He is loath to commence a contest, which must necessarily assume the appearance of a religious persecution, for assuredly it would be regarded by the Mormons as such.

That Governor Cummings possesses an unusual stock of patience is clear, or he would never have got on so far without bloodshed. But though he may have this quality—it may be said, perhaps, in excess; his interiors in office are not so forbearing. The last mail which arrived from Utah brings us the following intelligence that a collision between the troops and the people had become imminent. It appears that Judge Cradlebaugh has been holding his court at Provo, a city a few miles distant from the capital. That he has summoned witnesses, whose evidence, as it is asserted, will bring home to some of the high priests of the church the crime of murder. In the fall of 1857, a train of 136 emigrants were massacred in the Rocky Mountain Meadows by the "Destroying Angels" of the Mormons; and two men named Parish, father and son, subsequently met the same fate, under circumstances of unusual atrocity. To bring the alleged perpetrators of these crimes to justice was the aim of Judge Cradlebaugh. A grand jury of Mormons was empannelled; and having gained knowledge by experience, a guard of soldiers were ordered from the camp to protect the witnesses from the violence of their spiritual adviers. To the presence of the military the jury objected, and after intimating a couple of indictments, they refused to proceed further until the soldiers were withdrawn. But the composition of the jury proceeds, that the Court should not countenance demand, for it was feared that men suspected of having taken an active part in the murders above mentioned, had been placed upon it. With such materials [illegible] the ends of justice, and accordingly [illegible] the jury, with some re-

A solemn and impressive event occurred recently in the Baptist church near Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. After the sermon, John Hilton arose and addressed the congregation, closing with the admonition, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the son of man cometh," when he sat down, and instantly fell from his seat a corpse!

Father Chiniqy.

Since he has been under the ban of the Church of Rome, the Rev. Father Chiniquy has not escaped calumny, the assailants of his character being those who, while he remained one of them, were loudest in his praise. We learn that, having appealed to the legal tribunal of the United States, he has succeeded in mulcting one of his detractors the Rev. Mr. Brunel, $4,325 damages for which sum an Illinois jury gave Mr. Chiniquy a verdict last week.—Pilot.

A Man's Head Cut off by a Circular Saw.

On Thursday morning, a young man named James Finnegan, employed at Mr. Oliver's Steam planing and Saw Mills was engaged at work, and while in the act of moving, with a crow-bar, a log to the proper place for sawing, he slipped, fell on the circular saw, and was killed instantly—the saw severing the greater portion of the head from the body, and mangling it so shockingly as to present one of the most horrible sights we ever beheld. Finnegan was only seventeen years of age, and had been in the employment of Mr. Oliver about a month.—Ingersoll Chronicle.

The Visit of Royalty.

The Kingston News says that Mr. Speaker Smith has been selected by the Governor General to carry home the invitation to Her Majesty to visit Canada, and will leave on his mission in the course of the next fortnight.

Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie.

The Celebrated Canadian Radical (says the Dundee Advertiser,) has sent a letter to a gentleman in town, in which he says: "I am sixty-years old, but healthy and active as ever. I intended to come to Ayth last year, and resigned my seat as a member of the Legislature; but work I had to do hindered me from coming. You can yourself dream of the pleasure in contemplating such a journey. I intend once more to visit the old world and make one more comparrison between it and the new before I die. Times are dull here; money is dear; trade is depressed. The Government is extravigant and improvident; but the country is young." Although the number alive are few who knew Mr. Mackenzie when living here, where he was born we are sure he will receive that kindly welcome his public services and character demand.—Scotch Paper.

Escape from Coburg Gaol.

Some time ago, a Scotchman, formerly a resident in this part of Canada was robbed of $600 at Chicago. Suspicion fell on a cabman of the name of Farrell, who had driven the man robbed shortly before the money was missed, and who absconded shortly afterwards, actually leaving his horse and cab in the streets. Information of the robbery was communicated to the police in different parts of the United States and Canada including Toronto. There being some reasrn to suppose that Farrell had found his way here, Mr. Sherwood who was then Chief of Police instructed detective officer Courtney to institute inquiries, with the view of tracing him. Courtney ascertained, after a while that he had actually been in the city, and all trace of him was here lost for a time. About a week ago, however, Courtney discovered that a person answering his description had been seen in Cobourg. The constable lost no time in proceeding to that place. The person suspected was found to be Farrell, and he was arrested and taken before a magistrate. While the necessary papers were being completed for transferring him to the United States authorities, he was committed to Cobourg gaol, but by some means, which we have not learnt, he succeeded in making his escape. This was on Friday evening last, and he has not been heard of since.

Melancholy Calamity.

A most melancholy calamity occurred at Belle River, a station on the Great Western Railway, about twenty miles west of Chatham, on Wednesday last, whereby a woman lost her life under unusually painful circumstances. It appears that a number of men were employed in painting some buildings for the Railway Company, and had occasion to use a large bottle, the property of the station-master, in which to boil a quantity of oil. The fire in the stove being exceedingly furious, the oil boiling at a great rate, the station-master's wife thought it prudent to endeavor, if possible, to decrease the blaze. In doing so she somehow moved the stove-pipe from its original position, which greatly endangered the safety of the premises. In her fear she ordered upon a chair for the purpose of replacing the pipe; but in her attempt to do so, the chair slipped along the floor and precipitated the unfortunate woman head foremost into the bottle of boiling oil! In addition to this, the pipe from the stove came in contact with her garments, and before she could be rescued, the two not only enabled in such a manner that the flesh and hair left her face, neck and hand, upon the slightest touch, but her whole body was burned in a most frightful manner. Indeed It is said by those, who were present that the remains could scarcely be recognised, as being those of a human being. At the [illegible] of her unfortunate husband, and sickening catastrophe, only the unfortunate victim and a little child were in the house. As quickly as the alarm reached those parties outside, all the assistance possible was immediately rendered; but when the body was removed from its fearful position life had left it. An inquest was at once held, and a verdict rendered in accordance with the above facts.

The name of the unfortunate deceased was Taylor. We also learn that a person named Rambel, who was one of the first to assist in removing Mrs. Taylor, was also badly burned, but is now doing well.—Chatham Planet.

Music Hath Charms.

From the Glasgow Banner.

To the fascinations of music few, if any, are insensible. The general opinion, however, as to this most delightful and most easily appreciable of the fine arts is, that it is only calculated to a momentary, though pleasing, gratification. We claim for it an infinitely higher position. "The concord of sweet sounds" not only gratifies the ear, but has an unavoidable tendency to operate upon the feelings. In proof of this statement it would be an insult to our readers to say anything; we therefore merely refer to the well known incident connected with "Lochaber no more." Our attention has been drawn to the subject of music by the recent visit of Dr. Mark to this city, and the admirable concerts given by his "Little Men." The performance of these children afforded intense satisfaction, and created the greatest astonishment to all who availed themselves of the privilege of attending the three concerts which came off, under the auspices of the Doctor, in the City Hall, last week. To those who were not present we dispair of conveying anything like an adequate idea of what mere children, under judicious treatment, are capable of effecting in the delightful art of music. In concerted pieces they acquitted themselves in such a way as would have done no discredit to a thoroughly trained orchestra; and, in solos on the violin and other instruments, their exhibitions were truly marvelous.

It is not, however, of the merits of Dr. Mark, or the proficiency of his pupils, that we at present desire to speak. We merely take advantage of their visit to the city to direct attention to the benefits that must necessarily arise from due attention being paid to the musical education of the comunity at large, and more especially of its younger members. Dr. Mark has demonstrated, in the course of which we must regard as his benevolent and philanthropic mission, that it is practicable not only to infuse into children of tender years a passion for music but also to impart to them the faculty of giving pleasing expressions to it, either vocally or instrumentally. The Doctor also appears to entertain the belief that few, if any, are so deficient in natural aptitude for music as to be utterly disqualified by original constitution for making at least some proficiency in this delightful art. We would therefore, strongly urge the propriety of establishing seminaries for musical tuition throughout the length and breadth of the land, and we deem the subject of such importance as not to be beneath the attention of the Legislature. We do not indeed, entertain the absurd belief that all, or even the greater portion of the pupils who may be trained in such institutions will in after-life, emulate the fame of Paganini or Sims Reeves; but we have no doubt that those possessed, in a high degree, of musical genius would be afforded opportunities of achieving distinction which they would not otherwise have been able to arrive at.—It is not, however, for the benefit of the gifted few that we would strenuously advocate the system, but from the immense advantages that must necessarily accrue from it to the general population. A source of pleasure would be thus opened up to all, the beneficial effects of which it is almost impossible to exaggerate. Few are so insensible to the gratification to be derived from the concord of sweet sounds. Of this fact we have ample evidence in the eager crowds we see frequently assembled on our streets, listening, in admiration, to the not particularly dulcet strains, extracted from a cracked violin by some itinerant performer; or to the deafening yells emitted from the lungs of some fellow with a voice like a Stentor, and who appears to have been specially engaged to exercise his power of making a noise for the benefit of the deaf and dumb.

Now, since the passion for music is so strong that crowds can be found listening with rapture to the miserable apologies for it which are frequently heard on the public streets, it is reasonable to suppose that those who now content themselves with acting the part of listeners to the indifferent—and to a cultivated ear—the intolerable performances of others, would experience an infinitely higher pleasure were they qualified by sound musical education to execute in a superior manner, either by voice or instrument, a tune or a song for themselves.

But we insist on the importance and necessity of imparting, as far as practicable, a knowledge of the theory and practice of music, particularly to the young, an antidote to vice and crime. The general diffusion of such knowledge would do more for the cause of temperance than a thousand teetotal lectures; for were the musical taste to be thoroughly cultivated, and the capabilities of the pupil to be thoroughly developed, the dram-shop and other demoralising scenes of enjoyment would be shorn of their attractions, and a healthful impulse be given to everything calculated to promote the cause of morality and social order. Even the young Arabs of our wynds and closes, who wage a systematic war against the laws of society, would be led by the charms of music to relinquish their abandoned habits for the usages of civilised life; and the necessity for prisons, penitentiaries, and reformatories would be materially diminished. We trust, therefore, for these and other reasons which might be stated, that those in influential quarters will take up the subject of musical education with a zeal and earnestness proportioned to its importance, for we feel assured that by doing so they would confer upon the country a boon of incalculable value.

The Career of a Criminal.

FORGERY, DESERTION AND SEDUCTION.

The Detroit Free Press has the following:—

"A man named E. H. Monroe, a resident of Indiana, was brought to this city yesterday (April 13) by Officer Champ, private detective, from the northern part of Wisconsin, where he was arrested, after a long and successful evasion of justice, on a warrant charging him with being the perpetrator of a series of extensive and most ingenious and successful forgeries, whereby he realized about $12,000 in money, and swindled the bankers of most of the northwestern cities in a very complete and scientific manner. The plan of operations which he pursued was not a new one, but the way in which it was done and the success which attended it were quite remarkable. This was accomplished by purchasing genuine drafts on New York, Boston, &c., varying in small sums, generally not exceeding $100 or $125, and by means of which he was in possession, causing the red-ink indorsement and the words specifying the amount, and afterwards filling it up for an indorsement of his own and a sum of money varying in different cases from $100 to $1,000. These altered drafts were then sold at New York exchange to Western Banks and brokers. One of these drafts filled up for the sum of $800, and was sold to Little & Co., Bankers, of East Saginaw, which, on being sent east by them was found to have been altered, the original draft having been drawn by the Bank of Galena on the Market Bank, of New York, for the sum of $11 18. On the receipt of intelligence by Mr. Little that the draft was a forgery, he immediately came to the city, and placed the matter in the hands of Officer Champ, with instructions to spare no pains or expense in ferreting it out. That officer prosecuted his inquiries with diligence, and through a successfully laid plan at last became convinced that a reliable clue was obtained. Suspicion pointed to a man living in Waupaca County, Wis., under the name of S. M. Holt, and he immediately started for that region, up Wolf River, among the pineries. On arriving at Milwaukee he communicated with Mr. Beck, Chief of Police in that city, who detailed assistance, with whom Officer Champ proceeded up Wolf River, about 150 miles, and then across the country to the location in which they expected to find Monroe. They were entirely successful, and in a few minutes' time he was taken from his house to the hotel, where the Sheriff of the county was in waiting. He made no resistance, and did not deny the commission of the offences charged upon him.

He was engaged in the lumbering business, and had not been in that vicinity but a few months. The commission of the forgeries was not his only crime, but, as appeared after his arrest, he was guilty of a more flagrant offence, which involved the ruin of an innocent and confiding girl, and the unhappiness of a wife who had been deserted with her children for another. It appears that a short time since, previous to his removal to Wisconsin, and while he was living in St. Joseph County, Ind., he became alarmed for his safety, and fearing arrest, concluded to leave home. He then revealed the whole matter to his wife, confessing his crimes, and announcing his determination to seek safety in concealment. His wife was borne down by the revelation of her husbands villanies, but with true female heroism, told him to go and save himself, and leave her to take the responsibility of her own and children's support. He left her in the possession of a small farm, and started on his travels. In the adjoining county of Jasper, he made a stop of two or three weeks, during which time he became acquainted with a young girl named Martha Wilcox, whom he married and took with him to Wisconsin. The villany of this operation was rendered the more flagrant by the recent transactions at his own home, which he had left desolate but a few days before. Circumstances indicate that his conscience troubled him at the time. His young wife was sent for to the hotel, and came to see him. The scene which ensued when she learned the state of affairs is described as heart rending. She was entirely ignorant of the character of her deceiver, and the blow came with double force from the fact that she was left alone, far from home, and destitute. Her grief excited the compassion of all present, and added to the trouble of the prisoner, who was thoroughly overcome.

He confesses his crimes, and says he is willing to suffer the punishment. He is not a practised villain, but has been inducted to the mysteries of the trade which he has so successfully practised within the last year and a half. He is consequently more accessible than could otherwise be expected, and has been easily induced to tell his story unreservedly. He is broken down with contemplation of the fate which awaits him, and with the trouble that he has brought upon innocent persons. The ruin of the girl whom he deceived weighs heavily upon him. He has got rid of all the money that he realized from his operations, which have not been confined to their scope, but have extended to New York State, to Chicago Milwaukee, and other cities. He also operated in this city to some extent. At Milwaukee several bankers who had come from Auburn, [N.Y.] Chicago, and other places, met the officer and his prisoner.—Notes were compared here, and a large amount of fraudulent transactions made plain as his handiwork, the sum total does not fall short of $12,000. It appears that he has not been aided in his operations by any other persons, and that he is to-day as poor as when he commenced his career of crime.

Hostilities had all but commenced in Italy.

The Steamship Hammonia, from New York arrived at Southampton on the 19th ult., en route to Hamburg.

The Austrians 120,000 strong, are said to have crossed the Ticino, but the report had not been officially confirmed. There had been no actual conflict as yet.

The French troops were pouring into Piedmont.

Tuscany had joined France and Piedmont.

The French-Russian alliance was denied but the Times had published the provisions of the treaty, which caused a great panic on the London Stock Exchange, and Consols at once went down to 88.

About forty failures had taken place among the stock operators.

It was telegraphed from various sources that during the night of the 15th, 100,000 men under the Commander-in-Chief, General Gyulay, had crossed the Ticino, in three corps d' armee, and took the road towards Novara, and that they afterwards blew up the bridge of Buffora.

This news lacked official confirmation, and doubts were thrown on it. It was also reported that Austria had accepted the proffered meditation of England, and postponed the declaration of war. France had not accepted England's offer of mediation, but was said to be considering it.

The Times professes to give the provisions of the treaty, and draws the most threatening consequences from them, regarding the alliance as a conquest to England, inasmuch as Russia guarantees the services of her fleet in the Mediterranean and Baltic, in addition to the army of observations of the Austrian frontiers.

The King of Sardinia had issued inspiring proclamations to the troops, saying he resented Austria's ultimatum as an insult, and treated it with disdain.

Proclamations were issued for raising large numbers, and word sent enthusiastically received.

The King of Sardinia had gone to join the army at Alexandria.

The Tuscan army had called on the Grand Duke to join Prussia and Piedmont and declare war against Austria. He declined and fled, and Tuscany had declared in favor of a military dictatorship.

London—The Bank of England had raised its rate of discount to 3½.

FRANCE.

The most active military movements prevailed throughout France.

Eighty thousand French troops were expected to be in Italy by the day the Adelaide sailed.

It is reported that Denmark had concluded a treaty offensive and defensive with France.

The Paris Bourse was considerably excited, but less so than the London Stock Exchange. The 3 per cent declined 1 per cent. on the 22th, but recovered half on the 28th, closing at 62¼.

LATEST.

By telegraph from London to Galway:

London, April 30.

The report that the Austrians had crossed the Ticino on the 29th was incorrect. They received orders to do so, but those being countermanded, they remained on the east bank. It is ascertained, however, that subsequently the advance posts crossed and that the main army would do so on the 29th.

The Austrian official journal contains an Imperial manifesto, explaining the necessity of war with Sardinia, and authoratively denies a secret treaty between France and Russia.

THE VERY LATEST..

London, Saturday, Noon.

The Austrian manifesto is considered as tantamount to a declaration of war.

Saturday.

The Austrians have crossed the Ticino and hostilities have commenced! This is official.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Warlike preparations are going forward rapidly in England. At Woolwich there was great activity. The Government had chartered several vessels to convey troops and ammunition to the Mediterranean.

There were rumors of a proclamation calling for 10,000 men for the navy.

There was a great panic in London and Consols fluctuated excessively.

An Indian Teetotaller.

Sigenook was, in his younger days, in the continual habit of drinking to excess, and when under the influence of the potations was a perfect maniac, and only to be controlled by main force; but as the attempt to place him under due restraint was attended with no small danger on account of his Herculean strength, it was the custom of his attendants to increase the amount of stimulus, and ply him with it until he became insensible, rather than expose themselves to danger from his ungovernable violence. One day, when in this drunken stupor, Captain Anderson—who at the time filled the post of Indian agent—saw him lying in front of his lodge in one of his fits of oblivion, and bound him hand and foot with strong cords, placing a sickly, decrepit boy to watch over him, with instructions to hasten to him (Captain Anderson) the moment the sleeper should awake, and by no means to let him know who it was that had bound him. After some hours he revived, and angrily demanded of the boy, who had dared to treat him with such indignity. The little fellow, without replying to the enquiry, bobbled away to the captain: he at once hastened to the prisoner, who put the same interrogatory to him as he had before done to the boy, and furiously demanded his instant liberation. The captain replied that the boy had bound him by his own orders, and that he had lain for hours exposed to the derision of the whole camp. He took the opportunity, also, of commenting forcibly on the disgrace to which so great a warrior had thus subjected himself, merely to gratify a vile and disgusting propensity, which reduced him manifestly beneath the level of the brute beast, which never sacrificed its reason, or the power to protect itself from annoyance or insult from its fellows. Sigenook, his pride humbled, and greatly mortified at the degraded position in which he had placed himself—in the power, as it were, of the most helpless of the tribe—formed the prompt resolution of at once and for ever abandoning his favourite habit, and promised Captain Anderson that if he would release him from his bonds he would never again taste ardent spirits.—The captain took him at his word, and unbound him. Twenty-three years had elapsed since the occurrence, during which Sigennok had never been known to violate the promise then made.—Wanderings of an Artist among the Indians of North America.

Douglas Jerold's Habits.

It is said in the life of Douglas Jerold, by his son, that they could never draw a straight line, nor play any game that required manual skill; nor carve the plainest joint nor ride a horse, nor draw a cork. He dashed gallantly at each accomplishment, but gave it up after a vehement but futile effort.

He was the most helpless among men. He never brushed his hat; never opened a drawer to find a collar; never knew where he had put his stick. Everything must be to his hand. His toilet was perfumed usually with his back to the glass. It mattered not to him that his breakfast was away. "Plain linen and country washing," he used to eject as containing all a man need care for in the matter of dress. He was, however, passionately fond of any kind of new preparation for shaving—of any newly invented strop or razor. He had these things in immense quantities, and seldom tried each more than once.

If a thing did not succeed in the first trial it was cast aside forever. Patent corkscrews, coffee pots, match boxes, knives and lamps delighted him. If he saw something he must have it instantly. Struck by a waistcoat in a shop window, he must go in, try it on, and if it fit him, wear it on the spot, sending home that in which he left his house. One day he returned home with an instrument shaped like a horse-shoe, within the magic circle were hooks to take stones from the equine hoof, with saws, a gimlet, a corkscrew, a boothook, &c., and he carried this curious instrument about with him for some time, highly pleased with the skill the workman had exhibited in cramming so many utensils in so confined a space. His evenings at home, when not devoted to writing, (and in the latter years he seldom wrote after dinner) were spent usually alone in his study, with some favorite authors or throwing off rapid letters of invitations, or suggestings of service to friends.

Shocking.—The sister of a soldier was taking leave of him, at the Bristol station, England, when the bustle of each of the carriage doors struck her, and opened her to fall on the rails. A train went over her, and crushed her to death.

WILLIAM BELL,
GEORGE YOUNG, } Auditors.

North Monaghan, May 7th, 1859

Three Husbands claiming the property of one dead Woman.

The New York Surrogate's Court has a case under consideration, in which a woman left $6,000 in money, mostly deposited in the Savings' Bank. Shortly after her death, Deimbong, with whom she had been living as her husband, took out letters of administration, was met by an injunction against acting under those papers, issued upon the application of James A. Gilbert, who claimed that two years prior to her marriage with Deimbing, she had lived with him [Gilbert] in San Francisco, California, and had there made a will leaving her property to him. Shortly after the injunction was granted, another complaint appeared, Mr. William Busselman, who set up a superior title to the estate, on the ground that he was the first husband of the deceased, having married her ten years before in Baden, Germany, when she was about eighteen years of age.

Subsequent to the appearance of Mr. Busselman, the will under which Gilbert claimed the estate, came from California, where it had been proved. Gilbert, on presenting his paper to the Surrogate, admitted the first marriage of deceased, but claimed the estate under the will. Deimbing now contends that the property belonged to the testatrix and himself as joint partnership property, which he as surviving partner, was entitled to administer upon.—Busselman urges the laws of California, that a married woman cannot make a will without the consent of her husband.

It appears that shortly after the marriage with Busselman, the parties emigrated to this country, and after their arrival here a misunderstanding occurred between them, they separated by mutual consent, and the woman proceeded to California, where she became acquainted with Gilbert, and lived with him. After a lapse of time the young woman left Gilbert, and set out for Germany. There she saw Deimbing, brought him to New York and married him and then it appears that she left him and returned to Gilbert in California, where she staid about one month. She again returned to Deimbing, and died while living with him. Deimbing denies any knowledge of the marriage with Busselman.

Recommendations to Mercy in Trials for Murder.

Who doubts the guilt of Dr. King?—Who supposes that he was not the murderer of his wife?—the deliberate destroyer of her who, despite cruelty, reposed confidence in his truth and love? And if a murderer, is not Dr. King a murderer of the blackest dye? For the destruction of life, in some circumstances, a certain degree of mitigation may be urged. A quarrel sometimes eventuates death. In the moment of passion man or woman may inflict a mortal wound which precipitates a fellow-creature into eternity. The ordinary prisoner has no such excuse. Momentary anger is not the cause of his guilt. There must be premeditation—they resolve to take life by means least likely to be guarded against, and least likely to admit of failure. In Dr. King's case, the prisoner's guilt was intensified a hundred fold. In enormity it could not be surpassed. He told his trusting wife when yet in health that her death was inevitable; and then with diabolical coolness and cunning, he set himself to work to verify his perdictions. As a physician he prescribed for her; as a husband he administered the medicine prepared by his own hand. He stood by her bedside to witness the working of arsenic himself had given. He saw the nausea, the burning thirst, the racking pain, without changing his fiendish purpose.—For a fortnight or more he persisted—steadily administering poison, using words of endearment to induce his wife to take it and finally seeing her pass into the sleep of death without the faintest manifestation of feeling. And all because she did not exactly please his taste! All because he desired another in her stead!—Surely if ever a case occurred to justify the exercise of what is called the vengeance of the law, this was it. From beginning to end, it evidences a cold-blooded brutality that should be met with the most condign punishment provided by the law.

And yet, in this identical case, a jury assembled at Cobourg accompany their expression of the prisoner's guilt with a recommendation to mercy.

Were the question not one of life or death, such a recommendation would be best met with ridicule. But folly is not the worst feature. It involves a tampering with the gravest of all duties. It implies a mawkish sympathy with criminals or a misgiving as to the prisoner's guilt. The latter supposition is in the present case altogether inadmissible. And the recommendation therefore indicates a wish that the course of the law shall be stayed for the personal benefit of Dr. King.

The majority of our readers will probably concur with us in thinking that if ever a man merited hanging, Dr. King is he.—But we would put the issue upon broader ground. Are jurors' recommendations to mercy fair to the prisoner, just to the executive, or in a public sense expedient?—We think not. So far as the prisoner is concerned, such a recommendation is calculated to excite groundless hopes, and so to frustrate the endeavors of those about him. To the executive the recommendation is unjust, inasmuch as it entails a special responsibility from which the Governor General and his advisers should be tempted. To the public it is mischievous, since the law, to have the proper preventive effect, should be regarded as above caprice or accident.

That certain jurors object to capital punishment is a fact which does not affect the question. The duty of a juror is to determine guilt or innocence according to the evidence before him; with the consequences of his verdict he has nothing to do. The spectacle just witnessed at Cobourg proves that in the minds of some men regard for the obligations of an oath is at variance with the respect and submission of the law have alone to deal. We have not patience to bestow such a burlesque upon conscientiousness.—Ottawa Citizen.

Died.

On Sunday, the 1st instant, at the family residence North Monaghan, near Peterborough, in sure and certain hope of a glorious immortality, Julia, the beloved wife of Mr. Thomas Rastland, Sr., aged 69 years.

At the family residence in Port Hope, on the 6th instant, after a long and severe illness, Sarah Ann, the beloved wife of Joseph Hotcher, Esq., in the 28th year of her age, leaving three children to mourn her loss.

The remains were conveyed to the residence of her father, J. T. Heathorn, Esq., in Peterboro', and interred in the Little Lake Cemetery, on Sunday last.

The English Revenue—In the account for the quarter, Customs show an increase of £25,000; the Excise a decrease of £60,000; Stamps and Taxes a trifling increase; the Income-Tax a decrease of nearly £1,000,000; the Post-Office an increase of £125,000. In the Crown lands the variations are trifling. The account for the year exhibits—Customs, increase nearly £1,000,000; Excise, increase above £70,000; Stamps, increase nearly £600,000; Taxes, increase £10,000; Income-Tax, decrease nearly £5,000,000; Post-Office increase, £280,000; Crown lands, a trifling increase; miscellaneous increase, over £500,000. Total decrease for the quarter, somewhat above £800,000; and for the year, under £5,000, which, had it not been reduced Income-Tax, would have been augmented into an increase of that amount.

The Spanish Government has instigated by the Papal nuncio, now in London, to lay siege to their treasuring [illegible] to Protestant.

NOTICE.—All parties depositing moneys for any purpose whatsoever to the credit of the Receiver General in any of the Agencies of the Agricultural.

Give roses a strong, rich soil, a pure atmosphere, and shelter from high winds, from whatever quarter they may come, and they will do well. Animal refuse is considered by a severe an enemy than high winds.

Though rough-looking and seemingly hardy, the Egg plant is one of the tenderest in the garden.

Tomato plants, which can now be set out any time, in warm beds, should be protected for the first two weeks.

One of the best nourishers of Hollyhocks is one that they should have a well-trenched row to the depth of two feet. Young plants should be planted each year, as in the case of the dahlia, if the finest flowers are desired.

By planting cabbages in a border where pear or other fruit trees grow, the roots of the tree are forced to seek their nourishment in the cold, deep soil below, and hence the trees are unproductive. Cabbages should never be planted close to fruit trees.

Says an American gardener:—Last year I planted 18 pea-nuts, or ground-nuts. I took them out of the shuck and put three kernels in a hill, in a light, rich soil, about eighteen inches apart. Used super-phosphate, about a table-spoonful to a hill, mixed with the dirt, and covered about two inches deep. Planted about the 25th of May, and dug the 9th of October, and had three quarts and a pint of large, ripe peanuts.—I took them to our County Fair and got a diploma.

A correspondent of the Maine Farmer says: For bloody milk of cows, take herb bobillis, grind with the head and mix with meal or oats.

The only remedies that are likely to prove beneficial to horses in the treatment of glanders are, cod liver oil, phosphate of lime, vegetable tonics and blood root; these may be given in the ordinary doses as recommended for other diseases; at the same time I should give thirty drops per day of oil of sassafras, and occasionally inject the nasal cavities with diluted pyroligneous acid.

An English farmer says:—I am inclined to believe that the generality of cases of black quarters can be traced to damp or cold, or both combined, for I have never heard of any losses where animals have been kept in dry or well-drained stalls with plenty of straw under them. I think if animals are kept more under shelter, and perfectly dry, especially during the damp and changeable seasons of the year, not much fear need be entertained with regard to black quarters.

In an experiment tried by Rufus Brown, a Vermont Farmer, it was found that the gain in the crop of potatoes by the use of ashes at the rate of a teacupful to the hill was about a bushel and a half of potatoes for each bushel of ashes used.

The whitewashing of cattle and horse stalls, as well as inside of hog pens and henneries, not only renders them more healthy, but prevents the animals and fowls from being infested with troublesome vermin.

R. STEVENSON.
Brock Street, opposite McGregor's Hotel.
Peterborough, April 14th, 1859. 15

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S
CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 15 to 20 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.
All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.
PRICE $40
All orders directed to "H. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.
The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.
Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."
N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 15th, 1856
Peterborough, April 21st, 1859. 16

THE SUBSCRIBERS beg to inform the inhabitants of Mr. Thomas Russell, and the public in general, that they have entered into partnership, and have made arrangements with him to succeed him in the business. They desire to return all who favour them with their custom, that their wants will be promptly attended to, and their work done in a manner that will give satisfaction. They will always be found ready to receive orders, and by the strict attention to their business, hope to merit a share of the public patronage.
A good assortment of Goods must be kept constantly on hand, and cash or approved paper must be given for Goods or work received each.
Remember the old stand opposite the Eastern entrance to the Town Hall.
O'BRIEN & HAGERTY.
Peterboro', January 13th, 1859. 3

J. G. CALENDER,

Surgical and Mechanical Dentist,

KNOWN to the inhabitants of Peterborough and vicinity, for the past 12 years, intends (by will continue to visit Peterboro', on the first Monday in each month, for the week), prepared to perform all operations of the profession, in defiance of competition as to neatness and durability, (except filling teeth with platina, is being a substance not then used by the profession.) He is also prepared to insert Teeth on Vulcanized Rubber, a much approved new style, being free from taste, much cheaper than Gold, and is said to be equal in neatness and durability, and much more agreeable in the mouth, being less weighty.
Public attention is invited to the above. Rooms over Mr. Clinton's Store.
Peterboro', 9th Dec., 1858. 49

NOTICE.

THE HAPPY TIME.

A WOMAN'S REVERIE.

I can see it all, as I sit here alone. The years drop from me like a cloak, and I am no more the gray haired invalid, sitting in my arm-chair beside the fire and shivering at every draught of air, or every noise in the passage outside. I am a young girl of twenty-one, and the sunshine of a bright May morning is all around me. Let me think of it—let me speak of it. There may be many whose eyes will fall upon this page to whom it will do no harm to join hands with me, while I go back for a time, and gaze at this bright memory of my youth.

There are some expected days in the life of every man and woman, I suppose, when Nature seems to sympathise with her children, and create as it were, a glory of loveliness, expressly for them, of all others, to be happy in. It was such a day to me—that 24th of May. The air just tempered with a dash of coolness that made the blood bound quietly through my veins—the sun shining gloriously in a sky of unclouded blue—a faint breeze stirring the young leaves upon the tree, and making the dew-drops tremble on the slender blades of grass—ah, what was it not worth to be young and happy and believed, on such a morning as that! I leaned out of my chamber-window in the little, red farm-house, and looked out upon the scene with a swelling heart. The sunlight fell pleasantly on the grove behind the house, and its walks were chequered with light and shade, far as the eye could reach. The hills beyond the village road were blue and misty in the distance. I saw, at the next house, that they were getting ready for church. I saw a carriage standing before our own door, while "Fanny," the little bay mare, was drinking at the well, and the cattle waited patiently behind her, till she had done.—The house-dog sat soberly on his haunches, half-way between the house and the gate, watching two white geese, to and fro on the little pond, with a small yellow gosling between them. All was still and peaceful. From the valley came the ringing of the first church bell—the crows were cawing in the green recesses of the wood—the birds were singing among the boughs—these were all the sounds that were abroad, in the blessed quiet of that Sabbath morning, in the land which lies beyond the sea.

He was coming to me that day. Is there any one who has forgotten the days of youth enough to ask who "he" was. I left my chamber and went down into the parlour. It was the parlour of a farm-house with an unexpired floor, and unpapered walls with plain white muslin curtains at the windows, and a white damask cloth upon the table; and yet how pretty it looked! The windows were all open—the soft curtains swaying gently in the breeze, and beyond them a bucket of roses, that throat class blossoms and sent their fragrance into the very room. The sunshine made great blocks and patches on the floor of warm mellow light. On my writing desk was a beautiful nosegay of wild flowers, gathered in the grove by my own hand—roses were blooming on the mantle-piece, and violets among the books and pictures on the table. There was no one to disturb me, yet I was almost sad—because I was so happy. I sat down before my desk, scribbled a few lines on a sheet of blank manuscript before me, and throwing the pen aside, took up a miniature that was always lying there, and opened it. I have it beside me now. It was a noble face. High forehead, sweet mouth smiling, blue eyes, with a world of melancholy in their depths, and waving, clustering, golden hair—they are all here, and Time has never touched this picture, though we had the original in the dust long, long ago. I gazed on it that morning, with a heart too full for words, and pressing it to my lips, and closed it, as the sudden roll of a carriage, and the mingling of glad voices in the yard told me that my friends had come.

I went to meet them. My gay cousin Laura had joined them as the carriage passed the door of her father's house, and waved her gypsy hat over her head, as she caught sight of me. Then came a silent, handsome young minister, offering his hand to help me in lighting, and blushing like a girl at the nonsense she was uttering. And then—the tall elegant form I had been looking for—and Arthur was beside me!

"There was nothing to the seeming in our interchange of hands."

I get how much we felt it! Without speaking, and was made plain between us. There were obstacles in the way of our love—obstacles which might never be removed, and which bade fair to separate us forever—yet with even that knowledge, what a happy moment it was! We went into the little parlour—we turned over the pictures, we talked gaily with our two friends who were wild with the beauty of the day; yet all the time we felt and ou stolen glances showed it, that we longed for one moment to be alone—and to speak freely, heart to heart. The time came, but not till the day was done and the sun was setting. We left the little grove where we had been searching after may-flowers before the others, and entered the house. I filled a glass with water, placed my bouquet in it and took it to the writing desk. I saw him reading, as I did so, the lines which I had written that morning, before he came:

"If it were all my spirit asked,
To bask in the light of thy smiling eyes,
Were, weary, worn and overtasked,
It turns from the glare that fades and dies—
Say, would'st thou bid them still beam on,
To steer me in each stern endeavor,"
Or when the light of hope had gone,
Would they too change, and change for ever?

I looked up in his face, and the eyes of which I had written were full of tears. He opened his arms, and as I sprang towards him and laid my head upon his breast, our lips met for the first time. We stood in silence, hearing our own hearts beat, yet saying nothing. The sun sank slowly down in the west; and Laura with her hands full of flowers, came singing from the grove, leaning on her lover's arm. There never was a moment like that, in life, for me or for him again!

"Do you call me wife? I do not feel it real? Why should I speak of the change that came to us, as it comes to all, in this weary world of ours. It is enough that the bright day had its end, that we were happy to the last in it. No heart ever loved as ours loved at that moment, that cannot guess the rest—the parting—the estrangement—the forgetfulness—and last of all, the green grave in the church-yard, and the unquiet spirit, stilled for ever.

Ah, how the dream has faded! The May sunshine has fled, and the gay young girl has danced away with it. I cower once more over my fire, and turn from the pages of my book, to look out upon the murky sky and the driving rain, and sigh as I think how long ago it all was! And only smile, when I remember that at best it cannot be much longer that I must endure this weary exile. Soon, oh Arthur—lost, but not forgotten—shall I follow where thou art gone—to a country where no barriers can come between us, to a home where no love can be sinful, and to a land where it is always May.

THE TWO PICTURES.

"How beautiful!" And the two men paused before the window of a print seller. The picture which had called forth from one of the men this admiring exclamation, was a showy bit of landscape, painted for effect, and well calculated to deceive an unpractised eye.

"I must inquire the price," said the speaker, whose name was Godwyn, and he drew his companion into the store.

"What do you ask for the landscape in the window?"

"Fifty dollars," replied the picture seller, "and it's worth a hundred. But the owner wants the money, and must sell even at so great a sacrifice."

"Who is the artist?"

A name not familiar to either of the men was given. But, as they were only posted up in art news indifferently well, and did not care to make their ignorance known, no further question was asked. The name was accepted as belonging to an artist of celebrity.

"I must have that picture, Martin.—It is a gem." Godwyn spoke aside to his friend.

"We have a companion piece by the same artist," said the picture seller, whose ears, all on the alert, had overheard the remark.

"Indeed! Let us see the two together."

The paintings were placed side by side. "Charming!—beautiful!—exquisite!" were the exclamations with which their exhibition were greeted.

"I will take one of them," said Godwyn. "And you the other." Looking towards his friend Martin.

"I don't know about that," answered the latter. "The pictures are certainly very tempting. But I am not just sure that I can spare fifty dollars to-day for an article of simple luxury."

"They're cheap as dirt," said Godwyn. "Better take one. You'll not have another chance like this soon."

But Martin hesitated, debating the money-question inwoived, and finally decided to let the companion-piece remain where it was for the present. Godwyn paid down fifty dollars, and ordered one of the pictures sent home.

The two men left the picture dealer's and walked on, Godwyn elated by his purchase, and Martin well satisfied at having successfully resisted the temptation to spend the sum of fifty dollars for a painting, when he had other use for his money.

"You will regret not having bought that picture," said Godwyn. "It is a gem, and is offered at half its value."

"I love pictures," was answered. "They are to me a source of unalloyed pleasure. But my income is yet too limited to permit an indulgence of this taste. The common wants of life, and the charities which may not be disregarded, keep me without a surplus to expend in the merely ornamental."

"I am no better off than you are," said Godwyn. "But a portion of my income must go in the direction of beauty and ornament. Bare walls are my abhorrence——"

At this moment a cry of warning reached the ears of the two men, and, looking forward along the street they saw a horse, attached to an empty wagon, dashing towards them at a frightful speed. A little way in advance stood a cart, backed up to the pavement. Before the owner of this an Irishman, had time to turn his horse, the runaway was upon him, and one of the shafts striking the poor beast on the head, killed him on the spot.

"Poor fellow," said Martin in a tone of pity, as he heard the Irishman bewail his loss.

"Come," said Godwyn, drawing upon the arm of his friend. "It's a mercy for the poor, half-starved beast."

But Martin stood still, and began to ask the Irishman questions. His looks corroborating his replies, satisfied him that the loss he had just met was the loss of means for getting bread for his children. The man was in deep distress.

"I can't wait here," Godwyn spoke with impatience. "Come, or I shall have to leave you. That picture will be housebroken I get there."

"Go on then. I must look a little further into this case," said Martin, quiet in earnest.

"Humph! You'll have your hands full if you stop to look into every case of this kind." Godwyn spoke a little contemptuously, and then went forward.

"Ah, Martin!" said he, as the latter entered his store about two hours afterwards. "How comes on your Irishman and his dead horse?" There was an amused expression on his face.

"Badly enough as present," was answered. "Poor fellow! The death of his horse is to him indeed a calamity; like the burning of a mechanic's shop with all his tools; or the sinking of a merchant's ship, wherein was all his fortune. But I think we can put him all right with the world again, and at present with an outside subscription, I propose that five individuals, [illegible] each put in another dollar."

Before reaching their home, however, Here is the list. I have put down my name, and Gregg has followed suit. You will make the third and I know who to calculate on for the fourth and fifth subscriptions."

Martin only partly unfolded his subscription paper, for a strong negative came instantly into the face of Godwyn.

"I'm too poor to make ten-dollar subscriptions for the purchase of cart horses for beggarly freshmen," he answered. "If I once undertook that business, I would soon have my hands full. Take my advice, and keep your money, your time, and your pleasant feelings, and don't waste either in the thankless task of collecting money to pay for dead horses."

But Martin, though disappointed, was not turned from his good purpose. He succeeded in getting thirty-five dollars subscribed, and then, adding fifteen from his own purse, he went to the humble abode of the poor Irishman, whom he found, half stupid with despondency, amid his sorrowful wife and children.

"Come, come, Jimmy Maguire!" he said, cheerfully, "this will never do. Brighten up, man!"

"There's no brightening up for me, yer honor," replied Jimmy, sadly. "Poor Barny is kilt dead," and he drew his hand across his eyes. "The cart's of no use now, an I if I was to die for it, I couldn't find money to buy another horse. Och! yer honor, and what is to become of us all?"

The picture that Martin looked upon in that humble abode by all in deep shadow. There was not up a it a single gleam of sunshine.

"What did Barny cost?"

"I paid thirty-five dollars for him, hard-earned money, and he was chape at that yer honor."

"Find another horse as good, or even a little better than Barny, and I will buy him for you, Jimmy. Some kind gentlemen have placed money in my hands for that purpose."

Broad flashes of sunlight fell instantly on the living picture, which lay a moment before in deepest shadow.

"Oh, sir! Is it indeed as you say?" Jimmy caught the arm of Mr Martin, and looked into his face almost wildly.

"Just as I say f Jimmy Maguire. Find the horse, and I will make him yours."

From the valley of grief and despair to the mountain-top of joy, the Irishman's household passed, as by a single stride.—They overwhelmed their benefactor with noisy gratitude, and placed him at once high on the calendar of saints.

That evening Mr. Godwyn sat alone in his parlor. The picture was on the wall but his eyes were already more than half satisfied with its beauty, and ceased to turn themselves towards it for pleasure. A friend had been invited home at tea time to look at this picture. He had an artist's eye and knew a good painting from a bad one. Unfortunately for Mr. Godwyn, he detected glaring faults in the landscape and did not hesitate to pronounce it a fourth rate affair, and dear at the price which had been paid Mr. Godwyn was unhappy.

On the same evening sat Martin alone, gazing at a picture, the sight of which gave him inexpressible pleasure. It was now hanging upon the parlor walls, enclosed in gilded frame, but grouped in his thought, and vivid as life itself. We need not describe this picture. The reader knows that it represented the poor Irishman and his delighted family. Imagination had painted it in richest coloorings, and memory was enshrining it in perennial beauty. There was no power in time to rob that picture of its charming freshness. Its possession could not bring a reproving thought; no critic was skilled enough in art to find a defect, and thus lessen the owner's appreciation. It was worth a thousand such pictures as the one his friend had already ceased to value.

The lesson, reader, is for us all.

If we were as ready to hang the chambers of our minds with beautiful pictures as we are the walls of our houses, what pleasures would we lay up in store for the time to come. As we grew older, we insensibly fall into the habit of looking inwards. We see more with the eyes of the mind than we do with the eyes of the body—oftner gaze upon the pictures that cluster on memory's walls, than upon those which hang upon the walls of our dwellings. Oh! let us then give beauty and happiness to the future by daily acts of kindness—by tender cherishing—by deeds of human love. These will group themselves into pictures, upon which, as years glide away, and the eyes look more and more inwards, we shall gaze with purest delight; for time cannot deface them, neither will familiarity rob them of a living interest.

A South-western Story.

Twenty years ago, it was the custom in north-western Georgia, as indeed it was throughout the southwest, for dry goods dealers to keep a barrel of "spirits" in the back room, and to treat liberal customers to a glass whenever desired.

Fillers and Dewberry were such dealers in one of the small towns indicated; and they had for a customer a clever rollick ing old fellow, named Joe Denny, who drank whiskey in preference to water always and whose wife was "flesh" in that particular. The old couple would come in town, trade quite freely and as freely imbibe the spirits in the back room of the dealers we have named.

On one occasion both the old man and old woman contiguous their potations inordinately; and as Fillers observed that the goods went better the drunker the old woman became, he persuaded her to drink

At last she refused, unless he would sweeten it with a bit le more "sugar." Fillers indulged her and when the old people started home in the evening late, the old man could scarcely mount his horse, and the good wife had actually to be lifted and placed on the pillion behind him. Happily she bestrid one way, and her husband the other so that the gravitating point was between them the strong tendency to drunkenly slip passed out of the village safely.

Before reaching their home, however, they had to cross a small creek, and when their horse stopped in to drink, the old lady having recalled one or two more, released her hold, and quietly lapsed into the stream below.

Occupied with his thoughts the old man did not perceive his loss, but jogged slowly homeward. Arrived there, the children inquired anxiously for "mammy." but the old man could only say that she had been on the "critter," and the critter hadn't kicked very time; so he couldn't say where she must be!" and threw himself on the bed.

Girls and boys flew along the road the old man had come, yelling mammy! mammy! but of course no mammy responded

When they arrived at the creek, the eldest gal shouted.

"Younker she is, sitting down in the creek!"

And there she was, seated comfortably in the water, which came nearly up to her in nath. As she swayed back and forth, now yielding to the impetuosity of the stream, and now resisted it with some success, the muddy fluid would occasionly wet her lips, and each time it did so, she would faintly exclaim with a grim effort to smile:

"Not a drop more Fillers 'thout it's sweetened."

And it is to this romantic little incident in the life of the venerable Mrs. Joe Denny, that we are indebted for one of our popular colloquial phrases.

Horrible Murder from Religious Fanaticism.

From the Troy Times, May 3.

The quiet Sabbath was broken in upon yesterday by the commission of a horrid murder, in the town of Sandlake, about 14 miles from Troy, of a daughter by her father and only surviving parent, a man about 60 years of age. The scene of the homicide is about 4 miles east of Silver's Tavern, and near the steam saw-mill on the Sandlake road. The parties lived in a little house, in which the father carried a workshop for himself and daughter by following the trade of shoemaker. The daughter's name was Christiana. She is about 19 years of age, and is described by the neighbors as a quiet and well-behaved girl. She had been unwell for some time and, it is said, had been under the care of a female doctress residing in Berlin, in this County, named Wright. Her mind, it appears had been somewhat affected, but whether from religious excitement or from some other cause, we are unable to say.—She laboured under the impression that the devil had possessed her, and used to pray very frequently for deliverance from his grasp. A day or two before the murder, the old man and daughter went over to the house of David Horton, who resided opposite the Bellings, when Christiana said she had taken medicine of Mrs. Weaver, and it made her feel as if "the devil was in her, and she would scratch him off; but that she had thrown the medicine away, and drove the devil away, too." The old man had not done much work recently, and as it affected the girl's head, and it is supposed that in consequence of his care of her, want of sleep, &c., his own mind had become temporarily affected, and while under the delusion that "Dena," as he called her, was the devil, he killed her.

The account which Belding gives of the affair is that he saw the devil lying on the bed, and he struck it in the face. The girl, it appears, was lying down in the back room, in bed, followed her from that room to the front room, in which the murder was committed with a shoemaker's hammer. Her skull was completely smashed to pieces.

Portions of the hair were scattered about the room, and pieces of the skull were lying over the floor. Her face, too, was considerably bruised and disfigured, but no marks of violence were discovered on the other parts of the body. Belding says he thought she was the devil—that she appeared to be four times as large as "Dena"—and her face was too large for "Dena"—and from his previous and subsequent conduct there can scarcely be a doubt that the old man imagines he had a fight with the devil, or, as he expresses it, with "three devils, and he had all he could do to kill them." They lived alone in the house. It is supposed the murder was committed about half-past twelve yesterday afternoon. The first person who discovered the murder was Nicholas Ryermiller, who first saw the old man outside the house. He appeared very much excited, and told Ryermiller that he had "Killed the devil, and it was lying in there," pointing to the house. Ryermiller looked in and discovered the dead body of the daughter. He asked the old man if it was not Dena that he had killed! Belding replied that he did not think it was. Belding's hands and shirt sleeves were covered with blood. Ryermiller testified before the Coroner's jury that the father and daughter had lived with him about six months previously to their residing in the house where the murder was committed, and that they always appeared happy together, and, as the witness expressed it, "Never had any enemy unless." Christiana was a quiet, good girl.

Belding was raving like a maniac when the coroner arrived. Several witnesses were examined, and the jury rendered a verdict that, "in their opinion, said Christiana Belding came to her death on Sunday day, May 1, 1859, from fractures of the skull, and said injuries were inflicted with a hammer in the hands of her father, John Belding—he at the time laboring under temporary aberration of mind."

The Grand Jury sat to-day. The evidence in the case will be handed over to them for their action at once. They will probably authorize a commission to investigate the sanity of the murderer, and if he is declared insane will send him to the lunatic asylum, or they will indict him for murder, as in their opinion the guilt was manifest.

A Spanish paper states that a subdeacon of the province of Seregossa was riding on horseback, accompanied by his two daughters, a married housemaid [illegible] and their little servant girl. [illegible] had her dress and [illegible] the subdeacon was a spirited gallop-

Commencement of War in Europe.

The news received from Europe during the past week, and more especially by the latest arrivals, is of a most important and threatening character. A week ago the intelligence was received that Austria had presented an ultimatum to Sardinia requiring its disarmament within three days, with the alternative of an immediate declaration of war. Since then we have six days later news, of which the concluding announcement is to the effect that the Austrians had crossed the Ticino, and that hostilities had commenced. This is given as official, and was announced by telegraph from Paris on Saturday the 30th ult., the day on which the steamer left Galway. It had previously been reported that the Austrians entered Sardinia on the 28th ult., but this turn d out to be incorrect. The statement last received, however, appears reliable. A proclamation had been issued by Victor Emmanuel denouncing the ultimatum of Austria as an insult. The power of dictator had been voted by the Chambers, and the King left Turin to join the army at Alessandria. Meanwhile French troops were pouring into the country both across the Alps and from Toulon and Marseilles by the way of the Gulf of Genoa. It was expected that on the 30th of April there would be 80,000 French in Sardinia. Tuscany had also declared in favour of France and Sardinia, and the Grand Duke refusing to comply with the demand of his army, had taken to flight.

A last attempt had been made by the British Government to prevent war by an offer of mediation without the intervention of Congress. It was announced on the 27th ult., by the organ of the Government, that Austria had signified its acceptance of this offer. France, it was said, had it under consideration; but looking at the actual news from Italy of a more recent date, there was no likihood that this well-meant effort would have any effect in averting the impending collision.

There is yet a further announcement which adds very seriously to the gravity of the present emergency. The London Times announces the conclusion of the 22nd of April of an alliance offensive and defensive between France and Russia. This has been lenied in several quarters, and the Daily News, while contradicting the statement, allages that it is only a convention that has been concluded, a distinction without a difference of much consequence. The Times gives the terms of the treaty, convention or whatever else it may be called, by virtue of which Russia, under certain circumstances as to which we are not informed, is to advance four corps d'armee to the frontiers of Austria and Prussia, and to assist France with its fleet in the Baltic and Mediterranean. This announcement had occasioned great excitement, and caused a fall in the price of public funds, which for suddenness and extent has not been paralleled since the period of the last great European war. The impression produced appeared to be that just such another general conflagration is at hand. Active preparations were being made to prepare for the emergency the channel fleet had sailed with sealed orders, and it was rumored that its destination was the Adriatic. Great activity was reported in the navy yards, and the Government had commenced to hire transports for the conveyance of troops to the Mediterranean; among others, one of the Cunard steamers had been chartered for this purpose. In a speech at the Easter banquet Sir John Parkington stated that in the event of war it would be found that in the Mediterranean and in the British Channel there would be squadrons powerful enough to protect the honor and the interests of Britain. That the French Emperor anticipates a possible collision with England would seem to be a legitimate inference from the orders, alleged to have been given for preventing the dispatch of any more boats for the deep sea fishing and for the enlistment of their crews for service in the navy. Such a precaution could scarcely be required for the emergencies of the war in Italy, and there is reason to suppose it may have had reference to the likelihood of more extended operations on the Atlantic seaboard.—Scottish American Journal.

Britain's Position in an European War.

From the Scottish American Journal,

What the position of Britain will be in connection with an European war must be determined by the relations of other Powers in such a contest. The news received during the past week has thrown a varying light on the probabilities of this important question. First we learn that Austria had taken the initiative, and seemingly in disregard of the efforts being made to the effect of a pacific settlement, had adopted a course which virtually amounted to a declaration of war. The same mail conveyed an almost unanimous declaration of sympathy for Sardinia in this emergency, and strong demonstrations, in which the British Government participated, of the best strong agreement on the part of Austria. For the time being the public opinion was actually turned towards France as the champion of Italy against the tyrannical domination and aggressive policy of Austria.—This feeling, however was but short-lived. The announcement of an alliance, offensive and defensive, having been concluded between France and Russia, has excited a powerful reaction against France. It has in the London Times remarks, completely changed the aspect of affairs, and at once puts by taking consideration of the propriety of England going on active part in the impending struggle. A practical answer to this inquiry is already been given by actual preparations by the British Government for an eventual necessity which can scarcely be any longer regarded as a matter of doubt. With France and Russia in league against any of the other Powers [illegible] it would be self-destruction for Britain to stand by and allow any one power to [illegible] the weak, in their conflict with the strong. [illegible] the question was a political policy-[illegible] bition and hereditary policy would prompt them.

So long as the contest involved only France, Austria and Sardinia, the populations might have been left to fight it out among them, and the result might possibly have been a gain to Italy, although any undue aggrandizement of France or derangement in European affairs. The other powers might have seized a favorable opportunity in the course of the hostilities to effect a settlement, such as would not have been matter of regret to any party but Austria. Public sympathy is so decidedly with Italy, but the spectacle of France and Russia uniting in a league in behalf of good government and liberty in Italy is a little too much, even for the most gullible of sympathizers. The theory of some of our New-York contemporaries that France, although a despotism, is nevertheless a democracy, is to refined an abstraction altogether, for the foggy-headed Britishers, who can't be made to understand that tyranny is a whit better because it is based on the subversion of freedom. The only conclusion we are apt to draw from such reasoning is very far from complimentary to the notions of popular rights entertained by those who have recourse to such arguments. But now that Russia has appeared in the field among the champions of freedom, what are we to make of such arguments? what but that the affairs of Italy merely afford a pretext for a war which is prompted by dynastic ambition and other purely selfish motives on both sides alike? There is one thing to approve on the part of either France or Austria in this dispute. We cannot conceive how it is possible for any liberal and honest mind to sympathize with either, and when Britain does decide to take part in the contest it will not be from what can be properly termed sympathy either with the despot of Italy that now is, or the despot that would be.

If the statement regarding the Russo-French alliance should be confirmed, it might be considered that this alliance, whenever it assumes a practical shape, will determine England to go to war in self-defence. In such an event a policy of non-intervention would be mere insanity it would be waiting till the war came to Britain, in place of using the great resources of the country to effect a favourable adjustment on foreign ground. What was the policy of Rome in the days of the Republic is the only possible British policy now; it were most always be carried on in the enemy's country; the country in fact if it waits till the enemy comes to it. All the absurd ideas of the peace-at-any-price school must give way at once before such considerations. Britain must be a war Power while its neighbors are so, else it will cease to be a Power at all. The only danger it incurs is in the general non-belief of the people in the possibility of invasion. The inviolability of the British soil is a sort of article in the national creed, and one which is believed in with rather a superstitious spirit. But once the sense of danger is thoroughly aroused, the actual danger is at an end. There is scarcely any possible combination of European Powers that Britain is not able to resist and to defeat in the long run. It is the practice among some of our contemporaries to talk of France as being the first military and naval Power in Europe. It may be so on paper and in time of peace; but the practical question is how long it would continue to occupy that position in the event of a protracted war. It has a large navy now, but in the event of war with England will it have a large navy five years hence? At the commencement of the last great war it had a numerous navy, but years before the war ended it had no navy at all. Britain which had neither a great army nor a great navy even when the war began, had upwards of a million of men in arms when the war ended. Times have changed in many respects, but the national character has not altered on either side. France is still better prepared to begin war, that being an irrational pursuit to which the people are naturally addicted. Britain is slow to begin and not very well prepared at the outset, but it makes a serious business of it when it does get fairly braced for the work, and there is no difficulty, however gigantic for which it is not able to prove itself more than a match. War may be said to be entirely a question of men money, and mechanical ingenuity, and now more than ever Britain is able to cope in all these respects with all comers. It may be fancied that there is a scarcity of men for military service as compared with the continental Powers, but let sufficient occasion once arise for a great requisition in that way on the inhabitants of the country, and it would soon be discovered what the national enthusiasm could do to rival even in numbers the continental Governments. But it is on the sea that Britain's power must chiefly be developed, and in the present day it is in a better condition to outstrip all its rivals in that direction than any former period in its history. To talk of France as the first naval Power in Europe, is absurd. In accordance with its recent policy of menacing other countries, it has aimed at being so. But France would require to have a very much larger number of vessels than Britain before it could claim to be its superior on the sea. The popular belief of our Englishmen being equal to three Frenchmen is not altogether unfounded, though perhaps exaggerated a trifle. From the days of Agincourt down to those of Waterloo it has been pretty well sustained by action, and we are [illegible] enough to think that the old British guns would still be found heavier metal than their opponents.

Such speculations, it is to be feared may not prove altogether out of place or inappropriate to the occasion present and [illegible] ding. A general European war is [illegible] on the eve of breaking out, and it will be a war in which Great Britain must of necessity take a leading part. That it will partake in vast intensity and [illegible] fully, not without [illegible] of its [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by some American writers may safely be classed with those other predictions by the same writers which foretold the fall of the British Empire in the East eighteen months ago.

Such predictions betray a total misconception of the British character. As we have already remarked, the only danger to Britain or any of its interests, foreign or domestic, arises from a false idea of its security. Once make its people aware that there is an actual danger impending and you may trust undoubtingly to their readiness and capacity to provide for the emergency the more likely are they adequately to meet it.

The European Combatants.

AUSTRIA: ITS HISTORY AND ITS PRESENT CONDITION.

The Austrian Empire is bounded on the north by Prussia and Russian Poland, on the south by Turkey, the Adriatic Sea, and the Straits of Italy, and on the West by Piedmont, Switzerland, Bavaria, and Saxony. It covers an area of 257,653 square miles. Although presenting every variety of surface, the Austrian dominion is mountainous there being few districts in which mountains are not found, whilst the plains do not occupy more than a fifth part of the superficies. Three great mountain systems cover the Empire with their ramifications: the Alps in the south-west, the Bohemian and Moravia mountains in the north-west, and the Carpathians, forming a great curve, the one extremity of which abuts on the Danube, at Presburg, in the north-west, and the other at Orsova, in the south-west. In some of these regions the scenery is remarkably bold and romantic, and has been considered equal in grandeur and mildness to that of Switzerland. The most extensive tracts of low or flat lands occur in Sclavonica and in the south-east and central parts of Hungary and many of them are of uncommon fertility. The Empire belongs to a greater or less extent to four of the principal river systems of Europe—those of the Black Sea, the Baltic, the North Sea, and the Mediterranean; and with regard to lakes and inland waters, the Austrian territories will bear comparison with most other countries of Europe. In mineral productions Austria surpasses probably every other country of Europe. In Transylvania gold is obtained in large quantities, and in Hungary silver abounds. The repositories of iron are inexhaustible, and coal was found in almost every province. The Austrian dominions have a climate nearly as various as the surface, and they produce in one region wheat, barley, oats, and rye; in a second region the same, with vines and maize. The productive capabilities of the soil, however, are by no means rendered available, and on all average the crops are one-third less per acre than in England; and forests still cover more than a fourth part of the productive soil of the Empire.

For administrative purposes, the Empire is divided into 20 grand divisions; namely Austria, Salzburgh, Styria, Baricthia, Carniola, Gorza, Gradisca, Istria and Triest, Tyrol and Vorarlberg, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Galicia, Bukowina, Dalmatia, Lombardy, Venice, Hungary, Suabia, Croatia, Transylvania, Military Frontier. The population in 1838 numbered 35,570,996; in 1844, 36,293,516; and in 1851, 36,514,466; or 141-8 to the square mile. The various races of the people may be approximately classed thus: Sclavonians, 16,500,000; Germans, 7,200,000; Magyars 4,600,000; Italians, 5,200,000; Wallachs, 2,150,000; Jews, 780,005; and Gipsies, 120,00o.

Austria is emphatically a progressive State, and of late years has made immense advances in the development of its natural and industrial resources. In mining agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, a little and marked improvement is perceptible, and the Empire ranks conspicuously among the foremost states of Europe, and forms one of its great workshops. The products of the Austrian mines were, in 1847, of the value of $8,953,460. About one-half of the whole number of the mines belonged to the Government, and the other half to individuals. Salt, of which the product amounted to 7,928,963 cwts., is also a Government monopoly. The products of agriculture, in 1850, consisted of wheat, 40,741,750 bushels; rye, 53,338,875 bushels; barley; 43,662,500 bushels; oats, 71,876,090 bushels; Indian corn, 27,559,875 bushels; millet, &c., 6,702,500 bushels; and an abundance of potatoes, turnips, &c. In 1849, the principal manufactories in the several provinces employed 920,736 persons, of whom 138,439 were engaged in Bohemia, 183,325 in Lombardy, and Venice. The distilleries and breweries, 2,933; the silk factories, 1,086; and the iron and steel works, 1,058.

Besides its general import and export trade, Austria has also a very considerable amount of business in the transit of goods through its territories by river, road and railway. The principal exports consist of agriculture produce and timber, metals, hemp and flax, silk, wool, &c., and manufactured articles. The imports are principally colonial products—oil, cotton, hides, &c., manufactured and partially manufactured goods. In 1850, the value of the imports was $79,477,700, and of the exports $52,428,750. The value of goods forwarded in transit the same year was $9,797,500. The Austrian merchant marine comprises 269,827 tons of shipping. The railway system of Austria is only partially completed. The canals are very numerous, and are chiefly used to connect rivers. The ordinary roads are excellent.

The several principalities or provinces forming the Austrian Empire are united under a hereditary monarchy, the head of which assumes the title of Emperor of Austria, King of Jerusalem, Hungary, &c; and the prefix of "Apostolic Majesty" has been borne by the sovereign since 1758. The Emperor, since the suppression of the revolution of 1848, and abrogation of the constitution of that year, has enjoyed every right and prerogative attached to sovereignty, whether legislative, judicial, or executive. The provincial states, whose business it is to receive the laws framed by the Emperor, on financial matters, and to allocate and apportion the amount of supplies to be contributed by the different districts, meet once a-year, or oftener if necessary. The executive government acts through councils or boards, each having a chancellor, who communicates with the provincial councils, and with the cabinet. Hungary and Transylvania have each a separate chancery and are in all legal matters governed by their own laws, as are also the Italian States. Each province however, is under a provincial governor, appointed by and immediately amenable to the Emperor.—According to the estimates of 1851, the resources of the treasury amounted to $111,625,019, of which upon $103,890,372 represented ordinary, and $8,765,727 extraordinary receipts; and the estimated expenditure amount to $113,210,325, of which $103,728,195 were ordinary, and $10,481,830 extraordinary expenditures. [illegible] in 1848, amounted to [illegible] in 1849, to [illegible] and in 1850 to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

We have given under a seperate heading the details of the movement of the Emperor, his Generals, and troops for the seat of war.

A Paris letter, dated Wednesday evening says:—" It affirmed in certain circles connected with the Imperial Court that the highest personages in England have written very recently to the Emperor of the French, to the effect that in consequence of the conduct of Austria in breaking off negotiations and sending the peremptory summons to Turin, that Power has put an end to all sympathy hitherto felt for her; and that his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French has now their sympathy. I do not pretend to quote the words, but merely the substance, of the letter."

RUSSIA.

St. Petersburgh, April 16.—We hear as certain that the troops in Bessarabia are being considerably augmented. A full war footing has been determined upon for the army stationed on the left hand banks of the river Pruth. It is generally thought here that should the numerous Turkish reinforcements lately dispatched to the Danube be ordered to enter Wallachia, such an event will be followed by a crossing of the Pruth on the part of the Russian forces.—Such are the consequences of the thunder storm obscuring the horizon of Western Europe.

PRUSSIA.

A letter from Berlin states that the committee of the Upper Chamber charged to examine the Marriage Bill, voted by the Deputies, has unanimously declared against the principle of optional civil marriage, and, by a large majority, against civil marriage authorised under certain circumstances. There is, therefore no hope that the bill will be adopted by the Upper Chamber.

HOLLAND.

The coast of Holland has been severely visited by the late storm. As the steamer Telegraaf was proceeding from Amsterdam to Antwerp, she perceived near the spot called Ooltgensplaat a vessel making signals of distress her Captain immediately sent off his boat and rescued all the crew, consisting of seven men. Shortly after the vessel which was Vrouw Johanna, of Amsterdam with a cargo of cinders, went down.

SWITZERLAND.

Berne.—Two Sardinian steamers which ply on the Lago Maggiore, arrived this morning at Magadino, in Switzerland, in order to take shelter against a probable attack of the Austrians. The traffic on the Lago Maggiore has almost entirely ceased.

SPAIN.

Madrid.—The Queen has given audience to some persons who propose to establish cheap baths and washhouses, and has manifested a great interest in the project. The Queen and King have as usual in Passion week, visited seven different churches.

At last a Liberal member has raised his voice in favour of the persecuted, prosecuted press. Gonzalez Bravo made a spirited appeal to the Government that some pity may be shown to the persecuted press; but his appeal met with a rebuke from the Minister of the Interior, which convinced him of the hopelessness of any appeal to justice or reason.

ITALY.

Piedmont.—Under a seperate heading we have given full details of the state of Italy as regards the war movements.

A semi-official journal of Turin states that placards have been posted up by the local authorities in the villages near the Lago Maggiore, recommending the people in the name of the Government, not to oppose resistance in case of an Austrian invasion, and to pay any war contribution that may be imposed by the enemy, the Government promising to indemnify them.

The following anecdote is given by the Opinione of Turin:—" A banquet of officers was held at Milan a few days go at which, among the numerous toasts drank in allusion to the impending war, a young officer proposed the following:—' To the Austrian army! The French and Piedmontese armies will break against it like this brittle glass.' So saying, he threw the bottle he had just emptied into the air, so as to make it fall back upon the table, which, in fact, it did, but—without breaking.—The Opinione states that all the officers present stood aghast at this untoward omen."

Tuscany.—Letters from Florence state that the general opinion was that the Grand Duke would leave that city for Portaferrago in the Island of Elba. It was even said that notice to that effect had been given to the British Embassy.

Naples.—Advices have been received from Naples to the 23rd inst. Disturbances have taken place at palermo, followed by numerous arrests. Letters recieved state that 300 individuals were seized.

A letter of the 19th says:—" The day before yesterday a priest of Pendino, named Matteo, led to the palace of Caserta an old blind mendicant, who was stated to have just had a vision. Queen Christine, of holy memory, had appeared to him, and predicted that the King would not die at present. The mendicant received a royal hospitality for his good news, and, in fact, the state of the King's health has commenced to improve. The families at the Court go so far as to believe that the King is saved; but that is not the opinion of his Majesty's medical advisers."

TURKEY AND THE EAST.

Advices have been recieved from Alexandria to the 18th inst. M. de Lesseps has had an interview with the Viceroy, in consequence of which the public functionaries have been instructed to assist in forwarding the preliminary works of the Suez Canal.

The governors of Damietta and Alexandria have been ordered to admit vessels with materials for the canal operations free of duty.

The Progresso d' Egitto has been ordered not to publish any more articles on the Suez Canal undertaking.

The agent of France is said to have recieved instructions to declare emphatically the approval of his Government of the project.

On the 16th inst. people of Galatz made a ferocious attack on the Jewish inhabitants of the city, whom they accused [according to a wretched superstition] of having taken blood from a Christian boy, in order to make use of it in their ceremonies. The synagogue was destroyed, the kitchen and wardrobe of high Priest, in it were torn to pieces, the shops broken open and plundered, and about 200 Jews, more or less, injured. In the course of the day, troops having arrived from Bucharest; peace and order were restored, but place of the rioters were arrested.

Syria.—The Austrian Consul General at Beyrout has written to Austrian subjects and all protected under Austrian protection in Syria, that in consequence of the war between Austria and Sardinia, and the treaties they must not obey summonses of the Syrian police unless they have been approved of by him. The Prussian Consul General had previously published a similar notification.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

By the steamship Calcutta, we have files of Cape papers to the 16th of March.—Governor Sir George Grey was at Cape Town. The second Parliament was appointed to assemble on the 16th March, when the members were to be sworn, but the joint Houses would not meet for the purpose of recieving his Excellency's message until the following day. This arrangement is probably for the purpose of enabling the House of Assembly to deliberate at leisure on the choice of its speaker. Many of the Caffres who through want took service in the colony have proved very troublesome, and in some cases dangerous. On the 12th of February Mr. Blake, farmer of Camdeboo, was threatened by his servant who made a rush at him with a dangerous weapon. Mr. Blake was compelled in self defence to shoot the Caffre dead. Agriculture was progressing satisfactorily at Wittenburg. Small-pox had not disappeared entirely from Port Elizabeth; on the 8th of March thirteen cases were under treatme t in the public hospital.

The Struggle in Italy.

AUSTRIAN MILITARY MOVEMENTS.

" The Austrians, 100,000 in number, have crossed the Ticino. The French troops of which two divisions have already crossed Mount Cenis, have received orders not to fight before the artillery arrives.—Mount Cenis is covered with snow. Three thousand men are at work clearing the road but it is thought that the artillery cannot come up in less than five or six days. General MacMahon and Baraine are at Genoa. Marshal Canrobert was taken sick at Grenoble, where he was obliged to go to bed for some hours. He, however recovered sufficiently to go on after a short rest, and must at this time be at Genoa, where two French regiments met with the most enthusiastic reception. Flowers were thrown upon them from the windows, women publicly kissed the French soldiers in the streets, tables were laid out in front of the houses laden with bread, wine, ham, sausages, &c., of which the troops were invited to partake."

MOVEMENTS IN FRANCE.

A correspondent at Paris says:—" It is rumored that the French Senate will on Wednesday present an address to the Emperor, beseeching him not to leave Paris. Apartments, however are being prepared for His Majesty at the hotel de Ville, at Lyons.

" The Emperor, during the last four days, has given at the Tuileries dinners to the chiefs of the corps which are sent from Paris.

" The Empress has had a mass performed in the chapel of the Tuileries, to call down the divine protection on the arms of France."

The Nord of Thursday has the following paragraphs:—

" The neutrality of England and Prussia seems to be assured, the Cabinet of the Tuileries having received from those Powers the most satisfactory assurances as regards France."

" Baron Hubner has not yet left his post at Paris, but every arrangement is made for his departure at a moment's warning.

" The Emperor Napoleon has notified to the English Government that he has felt himself obliged to send a French army of occupation immediately into the Sardinian territory, for the purpose of being in time to protect his ally against the attack of Austria. The Cabinet of London has replied that, under the existing circumstances, England will offer no objection."

The Nord also has the following telegram from Marseilles, dated Wednesday:—" Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers arrived here yesterday. The greater part of the army of occupation of Rome has been recalled; only 2,000 men will remain in the Holy City. The military movements are extremely active here. The departure of troops and war vessels is unceasing."

Marshals Baraguay d'Hilliers and Randon passed through Lyons on Tuesday without stopping. Generals de Failly, Niel, Vinoy, and De la Motte-Rouge have arrived there. The latter takes the command of the 6th division of the army of the Alps. General Bouat's division has left Lyons for Piedmont.

The Moniteur of Thursday contains the following:—" The corps d'armee, which has been placed under the command of Prince Napoleon, will shortly be assembled at Toulon. General Regnault Angely retains command of the Imperial Guard."

A letter from Chambery mentions that the French troops, in halting at that city, were received with the utmost enthusiasm.

Rear-Admiral Count Bouet Willaumez takes, it is said, the commander-in-chief of two divisions of gun-boats.

The 20th of the line in garrison at Havre and Rouen having been ordered to Paris, only four companies remain at Havre, and national guards perform part of the duty there and at Rouen Part of the garrison of Orleans also having received orders to leave for the capital, were accompanied to the railway station by loud cries of " Vive l'Italie! vive l'Empereur!"

The Guard of Paris at present occupies several posts in Paris vacated by the regiments which have been sent off; and on Tuesday the regiments composing the division of General Uhrich, which was stationed in the forts, took possession of others. It is said that the National Guard will probably be made to occupy certain posts which were formerly confided to it, but in which it was replaced by the regular troops.

The following anecdote, connected with the departure of one of the regiments of light infantry of the guard, is related. As the regiment was passing near the Place des Pyramides, in the Rue de Rivoli, a young conscrivere, leading by the hand a little girl, aged about six years, left the ranks, and, entering the house at the corner of the place, asked if the offices of the Secretary of the Empress were not there. She was answered in the affirmative, and she cried,' well, then, I leave you my child! Take her to the Empress, and tell her Majesty that I know she will take care of her until my return from the war!" And so saying she left the child. The Empress, on being informed of this incident, gave orders that the child should be taken care of until the return of the mother.

MOVEMENTS IN ITALY.

The King of Sardinia left Piedmont on Wednesday for Alessandria, after having attended a military mass.

A telegram from Berne, says:—" The Sardinian troops have abandoned Pallanza, and retired on Sesia. The province of Novara has been also abandoned. The Austrians have left Varese, leaving 600 men at Lavino."

The Opinione of Turin states that the garrison of that city left on Monday for the army, and were loudly cheered by the population. The Piedmontese Gazette announces that the French Chasseurs Indigenes arrived at Genoa on Tuesday morning. They were received with enthusiasm. The Constitutionel also gives the report that the advanced guard of the French corps d'armee arrived at Turin the same evening. Count Chasseloup Lubat, Minister for the Colonies, had taken his departure for Algeria."

" BERNE, APRIL 27.—The Federal Diet has been convoked for the 2nd of May next. Their battalions have been ordered to the banks of the Ticino."

" The English Minister, Captain Harris, having received a counter-order from his Government, has not left for Milan."

" VIENNA, APRIL 27.—The Municipality of vienna has resolved upon presenting an address to the Emperor, expressing to his Majesty its fidelity and readiness to make any sacrifices which the state of affairs may require."

Another telegram says:—

" VIENNA Wednesday.—The British Government has offered its direct meditation between Austria and France upon the basis of Lord Cowley's proposals. Austria having accepted this offer has postponed the declaration of war for a day or two.—The French troops are now crowding into Sardinia."

INVASION OF SARDINIA.

The following telegrams were received on Wednesday:—

" BERNE, April 27—During last night the Austrian army, amounted to 120,000 men, under the command in chief of General Gyulai, passed the Ticino in three corps d' armee—namely, one corps of 60,000, commanded by General Benedek; a second of 30,000, commanded by General Gyulai in person; and a third of 30,000, under General Zobel. The Bridge of Buffalora has been blown up.

" It is fully confirmed that the Austrians passed the Ticino last night by the bridge of Buffalora, taking the roads toward Novara, and also by Abiate Grasso, through Vigevano and Mortara."

" PARIS, April 27.—The Patrie states that, according to all probability, the direction of the Austrian army is towards Turin. Advices have been received that several divisions of the French army have disembarked at Genoa."

" BERNE, April 27—The Federal Diet has just received the following telegram from the General of Division Bontemps, dated Bellinzona to-day:—" The Austrians crossed the Ticino last night."

" The Sardinian troops yesterday quitted Pallanza, on the Lago Maggiore, and retired to Sesia. The province of Novara has also been abandoned. The Austrians have left Varese, leaving 600 men at Lavino."

THE KING OF SARDINIA'S PROCLAMATION.

" TURIN, April 27—A royal proclamation by the King of Sardinia to the army has been published to-day, at five o'clock.

" The following is a summary:—The King regards the demand to disarm as an outrage on himself and the nation, and has therefore repelled the demand with disdain. The King calls to mind the cry of anguish, and says,' I will be your captain.' I have proved your valour on the field of battle by the side of my illustrious father. This time you will have for your comrades the gallant French soldiers, your companions on the Tchernaya, whom the Emperor has sent to defeat and support our just and civilising course. Forward to Victory!—Let our banner announce to you that our object like our war cry, is " Independence of Italy!"

" Up to noon the Austrians had made no offensive movement."

THE MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

We have received important intelligence from Florence.

On Wednesday morning nearly all the superior officers of the Tuscan troops [15,000 men] presented themselves to the Grand Duke at Florence, and declared to him that to prevent the revolt of his army there was only one way, viz., to unite with Piedmont and to unfurl the tricolour flag of Italian independence. The Grand Duke by the advice of his Ministers, immediately set for the Marquis of Lajatico (of the Corsini family, and one of the best known and wealthiest men of Tuscany), and begged him to form a new administration with a view of giving the reforms that were wanted. The Marquis of Lajatico answered that he could not undertake so important and difficult a task, or save the dynasty except on two conditions. First, the abdication of his Imperial Highness. Second, a declaration of war against Austria, and an alliance with France and Piedmont.

The Grand Duke refused to subscribe to these conditions, and declared he would quit Tuscany immediately, and without making any provisions for a legal and regular Government, leaving the Tuscans to do what they pleased.

Accounts from Tuscany, received by Mr. Reuter, allege that certain superior officers of the Tuscan army had endeavoured to prevail on the Grand Duke Leopold either to conclude an alliance with Piedmont or to abdicate; but it is further asserted that the Grand Duke had preferred to quit Tuscany.

Additional news received at Turin reports that Victor Emmanuel has been proclaimed Dictator of Tuscany. Prince Carignan has been appointed Lieutenant-General of Piedmont during the war.

At Florence, Count Gualtier having published a letter in favour of Count de Cavour, had been ordered to quit Tuscany, but he refused to obey, and took refuge at the house of the Sardinian Minister, invoking his quality as chamberlain to the King.

THE AUSTRIAN MANIFESTO.

VIENNA.—The official Weiner Zeitung contains the subjoined manifesto:—

" Matured by the events which, since the beginning of the year, have cast such dark shadows over the future of Europe, the decisive moment—a moment which may bring with it the most important consequences—is at hand.

" The sincere desire of our Emperor and Lord to avert from the word, even at the last moment, the dangers which menace it, the feeling of duty not to leave untried any means for maintaining peace that is compatible with the rights and dignity of the empire, and the wish to prove to every one that Austria is free from all blame if the evils of war should fall on fruitful and happy countries, have induced his Imperial Royal Apostolic Majesty to address himself directly to the Government of his Majesty's King Victor Emmanuel, in order to make a last effort for the maintenance of peace.

" During seven years Sardinia has displayed hostility to the sacred rights of Austria. By its more recent manifestations the Turin Cabinet has shown itself to be the declared antagonist of those rights.—By its armament it has placed itself in a state of perpetual preparation for attack. The only means by which the Sardinian Government can convince the world that it does not meditate war and revolution, is to render a return to regular relations between itself and its neighbor possible. Sardinia can do this by laying aside those arms which she can only use in order to commit an unreasonable outrage against international law, against the foundation of legal order, against the true welfare of Italy, and against the well-being of Europe.

" By order of his Majesty, Count von Boul-Schauen-tein has addressed to Count Cavour, the chief of the Turin Cabinet, a note [em Schreiben], in which the royal Sardinian Government is summoned to disarm. The summons which is conciliatory in spirit, though urgent, is made with all the earnestness of a last admonition that may be followed by the most serious consequences.

" If Sardinia, as a consequence of this step, which is accompanied by representations of other Powers, places its army on a peace footing [kehrtzum Friedensfusse zurueck], it knows that it is, by the given word of Austria, secure from any attack.

" It is not the intention of the Imperial Government to retract the proposition it before made—which can at once, and even before the opening of the proposed congress lead to any arrangement between those great Powers that have made extraordinary armaments—for a general return to a peace footing. Austria still holds to that proposition without making any alteration in it, although she cannot allow the steps which she has now resolved on taking against Sardinia to be made subject to the future negotiations on the question of a general disarmament.

" May it soon be our lot to let the present communication be followed by another which will give equal satisfaction to the advocates for an honourable peace and to the firm and tranquil self-consciousness (Selbstgefuhl) of Austria. Whatever may be the trials we may have to undergo, neither our magnanimous Monarch nor his faithful subjects will for a moment lose that confidence which is given by right (justice) and courage."

RUSSIA AND FRANCE.

We believe we are correct in stating that there are two secret treaties now existing between France and Russia. By the first, Russia binds herself, in the event of France entering upon a war with Austria, to assist her by the co-operation of her fleets in the Baltic and Mediterranean, and besides to take place an army of observation of not less than 50,000 men upon the Austrian frontier.

By the second treaty Russia is bound to declare war against Austria within fifteen days after she enters Piedmont.

It will be exceedingly interesting to know the dates at which these treaties were concluded. Perhaps it may be found that the first has been in existence for some time, and that the second, which is only supplementary to that which it is asserted was concluded on Friday last.

PRUSSIA ON THE CRISIS.

BERLIN, April 23—The semi-official Prussian Gazette (Preussische Zeitung) publishes a leading article, of which the following is a summary:—

The resolutions of the Government for placing the federal means of defence on a footing corresponding to the armaments of neighbouring States were prepared before the last ministerial proposals of the Powers had been made, and were accidently taken at a moment when Prussia was using pressing language at Vienna in favour of the above proposal. It was also accidental that their publication coincided with the first news respecting the ultimatum of Austria to Piedmont. The Prussian resolutions were determined on, quite independently of the events of the last few days. Neither the presence of German princes nor any pretended conventions, said to have been concerted during their stay, are in any way connected with these resolutions.

" As regards the last measure towards Piedmont the news were all the more surprising for the Government, because during the days which immediately preceded it, nothing had been neglected by Prussia to impress on the attention of the Austrian Government the incalculable consequences and the heavy responsibility which would result from every separate act of Austria.

THE FEDERAL ARMY OF GERMANY.

A letter coming from Frankfort through the Havas agency, and dated April 23rd, says that on the preceding day the President of the Diet had convoked an extraordinary sitting in order to take into consideration an official communication which had been made to her from the Prussian Government through the envoy from that country. M. de Usedom has, in fact, presented this communication to the effect that the various powers composing the German Confederation shall be invited to take all the necessary footing. The proposal has been unanimously accepted.

Prussia having declared two days before that she is in a position to mobilise the three divisions of her army, which she would have to place at the disposition of the Confederation, the Diet has, moreover, in accordance with the suggestions of its president, that a federal army shall be brought together in the Rhenish provinces, to be composed of the three divisions of Prussian troops, and those of Wurtemburg and Bavaria, keeping in reserve the contingents of Baden and Hesse. The strength of this army would be from 170,000 to 175,000 fighting men.

It is also worthy of remark that in the same sitting Count Reichberg declared himself authorised to announce in the name of his Government that Austria would place at the disposition of the Diet the three divisions of her army which belong to the Confederation, and which together are 110,000 strong The military commission has been requested, in accordance with the suggestion of several delegates, to put the federal fortresses into a complete state of preparation.

THE AUSTRIAN SYSTEM.

A correspondent writing from Paris on Wednesday night, sends us the following remarks on the system of Austrian government:—

" For more than 600 years that Austria has existed as a monarchy without great institutions she has not produced a great name in arts or in letters—no savant, no historian, no poet, no painter. Her rejection of the English proposals the other day arises from no sudden, no manly burst of passion—for her passion, and even her revenge, is subservient to cold calculation.—Her anger has nothing of dignity; she never rises to fanaticism. With her, honour never interferes with self-shness; her success is won by complete disregard of all that is ennobling. She is merciless in her prosperity—she has often abjectly implored mercy. She may make peace at any moment, for she feels no shame in humiliation—no debasement in the Caudine Forks, under which she has more than once passed.

" The word " country" has no talismanic virtue for the soldiers of Austria. She does not feel, perhaps she despises, that enthusiasm which immortalised the pass of Thermopylæ, which upheld the Roman after Cannæ; nor is hers even the religious fanaticism which bore the crescent of the Mussulman over some of the fairest countries of Europe, It was from a Hungarian Senate and for a Queen of Hungary, not an Empress of Austria, that the cry arose—' Moriamur pro Rege nostro Maria Theresa.'—The white plume of Henry IV. could rally a retreating army. And the wonderful soldier lifted up a dying eye, as his chief passed and spent his last breadth in shouting ' Vive l'Empereur! The Austrian soldiers have no such feeling; and some of the best generals of the Austrian army have been strangers.

" In the despotism of the Governments may he found now and then a redeeming quality: but the despotism of Austria vitiates nothing. No verdure flourishes beneath that stifling vapour. It may destroy slowly but destruction is certain; and the enemy she fears and hates the most, and whom she never spares, is liberty. Her existence as a great Power in Europe is a political necessity admitted by the statesmen; but while we blame the conduct of Piedmont and doubt their prudence or her foresight in the present instance, there is little doubt on which side public sympathies will be enlisted when the question is independence of Italy on the one hand, or perpetuation of a degraded despotism on the other."

STATE OF FRANCE.

In a letter from Paris, of Wednesday's date, we find the following remarks:—

" Telegrams of all sorts will anticipate any war news I can send. At Chamberry the entrance of the French into the capital of Savory, was a scene of intense enthusiasm they have passed Mount Cenis by this time. At Lyons the population is in a wild state of excitement, and frantically greeting the successive regiments as they passed onwards Volunteering for the army is now general all over France."

" Paris is in the anomalous condition of being absolutely without a garrison, a fact which speaks trumpet-tonged of the full reliance of Napoleon III. in the popularity not only of the war but of his dynasty—When as President of the French Republic, he sent his first war expedition to dislodge the lay Government of the Romans, the workmen and blouses of Paris rose en masse, and had to be quelled by brute force. Th y surrounded the National Assembly with cries of " Vive l'Italie!" and felt indignant at France because she presumed to sway the Peninsula. The custody of the metropolis is now quite safe in the hands of the National Guard, and a few horse patrols (one of which guarded the Bourse) were all that could be exhibited yesterday.

" A piquet of the civil force has had to to be stationed at the gateway of the Austrian Embassy, Rue de Grenelle St. Germain, as yesterday some working men, probably on an Easter holiday spree, became clamorous before that mansion. Baron Hubner has had no intercourse whatever with the French Foreign Minister, Walewski, for the last few days, and it is said he will not demand his passports, but simply wait till the formal conge is sent to his residence. I mentioned some time back that France has no ambassador at Vienna, Baron Bourqueney having thought it useless to resume his post a month ago, and being still at his villa on the Loire. The acting attache, M. de Bonneville, will intimate Hubner, and wait for a formal hint to withdraw."

" By this time it is calculated that General M'Mahon has sailed from Algiers with a first instalment of 6,000 African troops. His successor in the command of Algeria was named at the Tuileries two days ago when Napoleon III. singled out General Gueswiller, a lame veteran, in attendance with others of the staff, and gave him four days to prepare for departure. From the aggregate of first rate military talent brought to bear on this Italian campaign, it will go hard indeed with the French if they make any false move, and harder for the foe, who may be well up in matters of pipeclay, but have few leaders who of late saw actual warfare."

SECRET TREATY BETWEEN FRANCE AND SARDINIA.

It is stated that a secret treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, exists between France and Sardinia, by which Lombardy is guaranteed to Victor Emmanuel on condition that no impediment is to be placed in the way of the establishment of Prince Napoleon at Rome, and Prince Murat at Naples.

Rumour adds, that a copy of this said treaty has been adroitly obtained by an Austrian diplomatist skilled in such matters, at the fabulous cost of twenty thousand pounds sterling.

At Carnegere, the 10th ult., the Sepoys of Lakhaire who remained faithful during the siege of Lucknow were assembled in the presence of the whole garrison, and received the Order of Merit for their services. Major-General Sir John Inglis, in presenting each man with his well earned decoration, which excited them to all appearance of joy, delivered a complimentary address.

The 100th Regiment sail to Gibraltar.

A private letter received yesterday by a gentleman in town, from an officer in the 100th Regiment, states that after undergoing a very creditable inspection from the Commander-in-Chief, the corps received orders to hold itself in readiness for immediate foreign service, and a postscript adds that it embarked for Gibraltar on the 30th ult. We have been permitted to make the following extract, which will no doubt be perused with interest by our readers, being spiritedly written and full of bright hopes of glory, that will redound much to the honour and credit of " Canada our home:"—

" ALDERSHOT, April 25, 1859.

MY DEAR * * * *.—As you are aware, we were reviewed by the Duke of Cambridge on the 19th instant, and his speech to us was considered very ominous, especially in connection with the rumors then flying that he had come to Aldershot to select five regiments for the Mediterranean. He closed his speech with the words—" You are to go anywhere and everywhere, and"— He evidently intended to say more, but checked himself in time. And for once rumor has proved true—five regiments have this day been ordered to the Mediterranean. We received orders on Saturday (the 23rd) to hold ourselves in readiness, and we expect to sail on Saturday (30th) for Gibraltar.

Hurrah! we shall soon have something on our colours, and I may have some medals at last! Report says that the Austrians and Piedmontese have fought a battle, and that the French troops commenced marching on Good Friday. Almost too good news to be true! The 100th will be one of the first in action, and rest assured that we will do our duty well and that Canada will never regret that she entrusted her honours to the loyal Hundredth.—St. Cathrines Constitutional.

Sir Allan MacNab.

The London Times of the 25th April gives among other election intelligence, the following paragraph, by which it appears that our late Premier has entered upon a contest for a seat in the Imperial Parliament in the town of Brighton. We sincerely trust that the honourable and gallant knight may succeed in his endeavour:—

" Brighton is to be favoured with a Tory candidate of an uncommon stamp. Sir Allan McNab, ex-Premier of Canada, has issued the following address:—

" I venture to hope that my name is not unknown to many among you. For 28 years I have enjoyed the honor of a Seat in the Legislature of Canada, a body second only in dignity and importance to that of the mother country. Of that Assembly I have been three times chosen Speaker, and I have since occupied a position of the highest trust under the Crown. As a guarantee for the consistency of my political character, I must refer you to past conduct. Many of the most important measures now in force in Canada were carried during my Administration among the number a Bill for the organization of the militia, a body now equal to any militia force in Her Majesty's dominions. I may, therefore, assert with confidence that I am not without long Parliamentary experience, and if you do me the honour to elect me as your representative, it shall be cheerfully and conscientiously devoted to the service of your borough. I have ever been an ardent supporter of, and, when necessary, have taken up arms to defend, the glorious free institutions of Great Britain: yet I have not only advocated, but in Parliament have frequently been the originator of those wholesome changes which from time to time become necessary in consequence of the increase in number, wealth, intelligence, and education of the people. On the subject of reform, I may express regret at the occasion which has rendered this election necessary, and my opinion that a moderate and useful measure might have been obtained had the Reform Bill of the present Government been permitted to go into committee, where all its provisions could have been fully considered and amended. In conclusion, I have only to say that if I am elected your representative, being free from obligation or engagements to any party, no exertion on my part shall be wanting to prove myself worthy of the important trust committed to my charge."

A Rich Scene.

The following interesting Debate in Parliament, which occurred a week or two before the close of the session, we neglected to copy in our Reports. We now hasten to lay it before our Readers.

Mr. Drummond was an ardent admirer of hoops from childhood. He was born with a love of hoops. When he was a child of tender growth he used to trundle his hoop, all unconscious of the fate that was in store for him. Later in life he had swallowed a ring, which resulted in a hoop in-enough; and even now the sight of an empty hogshead brought tears into his eyes.

Mr. Brown complained that it was impossible now to choose a wife, since her defects were so hid by hoops, and enveloped in crinoline, that the naked—

Speaker—Order!

Mr. Brown—Mr. Speaker—

Speaker—The honorable gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Brown—Mr. Speaker the naked—

Speaker—Hold your tongue, sir!

Mr. Brown—The naked—

Speaker—Upon my soul, Mr. Brown, cork up or I'll have you arrested.

Mr. Brown—Permit me to explain, Mr. Speaker. When I said naked—

Speaker—(yelling)—Clear the galleries of ladies, Mr. Sergeant.

Mr. Brown in the name of the seventeen graces and the fifteen muses, Mr. Speaker—dearly beloved Smith—let me apologise, then, I only meant to say that hoops and crinoline had reached to such a rotundency, that it was impossible to arrive at the naked—

Speaker—(frantically)—Death and blue devils! Stop, or I'll brain you with the mace. Consider the impropriety of—

Mr. Brown—(wildly)—Truth! truth! truth! naked truth was what I was going to say.

Dr. Dunbar Ross understood his honorable friend to say that people cannot pass along the streets without being assaulted by highwaymen. Now surely the honorable member from Lake Ontario could not but be aware that the character of every member in the House was affected by such a—

Mr. Talbot objected to such unparliamentary language.

Mr. Ross protested against interruption. He was going to say, by such a dam—

Mr. J. Cameron the honorable member should not swear in that dreadful manner.

Mr. Ross—Why! doing anything of the kind; but would be tempted to do so, if not allowed to finish his sentence—but such a dam—(order, order,) a dam—(confusion) he would repeat it—but such a dam—(tremendous uproar.)

Mr. Wright stood up and moved amidst the wildest confusion, that Mr. Ross be expelled from the House for such awful language.

Mr. Ross—(black in the face) exclaimed that damaging statements was all he meant to say when he was interrupted by the fool—

Mr. Talbot—Who's a fool—

Mr. Ross—Foolish ass—

Mr. Cameron—Who's an ass?

Mr. Ross—(wildly)—foolish ass-ertion of profanity.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWETT'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 10 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fixed into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $60.

All orders directed to " R. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, " Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 29th, 1859.

Agricultural.

A handful of dry peat in the hill is said to have a good effect in preventing the potato disease.

By sowing nitrate of soda in small quantities in showery weather, under trees, a most beautiful verdure will be obtained.

The most sterile sand gives the best meadow by abundant and judicious irrigating. Germany can show a hundred thousand acres of their irrigated meadows, where a few years ago the soil blew around with the wind.

Mulching is one of the best means of preventing mildew on the gooseberry, and it is quite probable that sulphur scattered on the leaves will be as beneficial as it is in checking the mildew on grapes.

A correspondent writes that a single handful of salt given to a horse in cut feed three times a day, proved effectual in ridding him of worms. Another writes that a table-spoonful of copperas given to the horse will carry off the worms.

Stock are better kept in the yard in Spring till the grass gets a good start.—Then turn them out for a few hours every day. Continue to give them dry food every day for a week or ten days, to prevent scouring.

When seed potatoes are cut, it is well to roll them in plaster. We know farmers who think this one of the best means of preventing the rot.

Lay a coat of mud on the part of the tree stripped of its bark, extending an inch above and below the injured part, lay it on one or two inches thick, wrap the mud on with cotton cloth, and tie with a string.—If the trees have not become dry it will save them, provided it is kept on long enough.

A farmer who has had much experience in wintering stock, says, if you feed corn in the ear to cattle during the day, they will not digest it well; but a few nubbins fed at night, after the animal has eaten hay and is ready to lie down, will all be re-chewed with the cud and thoroughly digested, adding profitably to the keeping of the animal.

A correspondent recommends the stuffing of hawks, owls, and other birds of prey and suspending them in such attitudes as they are most dreaded in when alive, by the smaller birds. The skins of cats should also be stuffed and placed in advantageous positions.

There is but one true plan in making a good road through arable land; and that is, to ridge it well up in the middle, and allow no water to remain on either side.—In general this may be effected with the plow, the harrow, and the road scoop.—Some are of opinion that after the work has progressed so far, it should remain one winter to allow it to settle and become more compact.

David Thomas remarks, in an address: "Last fall I planted cabbages that formed large tufts of leaves but no heads; and I had a hope that towards Spring, they might grow into something useful. They were set in a trench, very closely, side by side, some straw thrown on them, and over that about two inches of earth. I set two tubes near each end to let the bad air off. In the Spring I was surprised at the result.—Every green leaf had disappeared—the larger plants had formed good heads, though not so compact as those grown in the open air, and all were beautifully blanched and fit for use.

VITALITY OF SEEDS.

The following list shows the greatest age at which some of our common garden seeds germinate freely:

One Year—Peas, beans, kidney-beans, carrot, parsnip, onaches, rhubarb, elm, poplar and willow.

Two Years—Radish, salsify, purslane, cardoon, rampion, love apple, capsicum, egg plant.

Three Years—Sea kale, artichoke, lettuce, marigold, rue, rosemary.

Four Years—Spinach, asparagus, endive, mustard, tarragon.

Five Years—Burnet, Sorrel, Parsley, Dill, Fennel, Chervil, Hyssop.

Ten Years—Beet, celery, cucumber and melon.

BREEDING STOCK.

From the correspondence of the Southern Cultivator we make the following extract:

"The term 'blood' as applied to neat cattle was used by Blakewell to designate those new breeds called into existence by him in which the most desirable properties to early maturity and easy keep had been fixed as a peculiar characteristic. Repeated and careful experiments have proved that some animals return twice the flesh for the food consumed that is obtained from others. By simply keeping young and growing animals warm and quiet, less nourishment is wasted in maintaining animal heat, and more goes to produce tender tissues and fat, and consequently giving a better return for the grain or forage consumed. More exercise, and a larger development of bone and muscle are required in breeding stock; while something of the high keep and fattening process should be omitted. Due care should ever be had to avoid epidemics, or diseases of whatever kind; and especially should caution be used in the application of popular remedies. We have no doubt that more cattle, horses and hogs are killed by medicine than are cured. In nine cases out of ten, nature is the best doctor for live stock, if not for the human species also. True science teaches both prudence and moderation in dealing with so frail a thing as life. Science informs us that warmth is, to a certain extent, the equivalent to food; so that the man who keeps his stables and yards well supplied with dry leaves or straw for his stock to sleep on, saves both fodder and flesh by so doing, and adds much to the value and quantity of manure. Good breeding and good breeding are almost synonymous terms in stock husbandry. Calves should be early taught to eat corn meal, and have a little twice a day. Sheep ought to be fed regularly with turnips, beets or carrots.

$100 A YEAR.

AND upwards saved to the Farmer, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 10 to 25 bushels of oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by case-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $40.

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

Peterborough, April 21st, 1859. 16

BOOTS & SHOES

THE SUBSCRIBER begs to inform the inhabitants of Mr. Thomas Bennett, and the public in general, that they have entered into partnership, and have made arrangements with him to manufacture in his business. They desire to inform all who favor them with their custom, that their wares will be kept equally cheap as to, and their work done in a manner that will ensure satisfaction. They will always be found ready to receive orders, and they hope by such strict attention to business as has characterized the former proprietor, to merit a share of public patronage.

THE MITHERLESS BAIRN.

In a small cottage on the estate of Lord Grahame, in a room destitute of all furniture, save the bed, and one low chest, lay a dying woman. Suffering, poverty and despair, had stamped each their rigid impress on a face once fair, now painfully wan and pale. It had been one of those round, blooming faces, whose beauty consisted in the fair complexion, rosy cheeks, dancing eyes and curling hair, more than in regularity of feature. Taking away these, and the merry arch impression, it was almost homely in the thin outline. She was alone, but her eyes were fixed on the door, with an eager, longing look, which plainly showed she expected some one; and while she still looks for her visitor, I will draw a sketch of her history.

Ada Leslie was the only child of Lord Grahame, the pet and darling of his house. Her mother having died at an early age she became her father's idol, and no indulgence or advantage that money could provide was denied her. She was literally a spoiled child, vain, wilful and impulsive, but generous frank and talented. At an early age she was betrothed to Charles Leslie, a young artist of talent and standing, handsome, wealthy and accomplished. She loved him fervently and fondly; and great was the shock to her heart when her father informed her that her lover—her idol I had almost said—was in the habit of drinking deeply, and he [her father] considered it her duty to break off the match, and keep his darling for a worthier man.

After the first shock was over, Ada never intended to abandon her lover; she with the romance of sixteen, declared she believed her mission was to reform Charles; and she knew, as her husband, he would leave his one vice for her sake. Had he not said so? Remonstrances even threats, were vain to turn her from her resolution; and finally in anger, her father told her to decide between himself and Charles; for so surely as she married a drunkard, he would cast her off for ever. She did decide, and became Charles Leslie's wife. Four years after her marriage, her husband died a poor drunkard. For two years after that she supported herself and her little boy, pleading in vain for forgiveness from her father; and now, after a long illness of nearly thirteen months, during which time she had lived by charity, she lay dying in the meanest cottage on her father's estate.

The door opened, and a woman came in, leading by the hand a little boy. The invalid's breath came short and quick, and she feebly raised her head, lifting her eyes with a mournful, inquiring look to the woman's face.

"Sure, marm," said she with a strong brogue, "the ould gintleman was in the very worst of timpers; and I wouldn't like to repeat his message, marm, when I could him ye'd be wishin' to see him."

"Yes, yes, Hannah tell me. What did my father say?"

"Sure, marm, he said ye had gone to live away from him; and he wouldn't come —and—and——"

Yes, Hannah, and what?"

"And ye might die without him! Oh, sure what have I done?" cried Hannah, as Ada fell back senseless on the pillow. "Sure, he didn't believe ye were so bad. Och, my lady, don't take it so hard! Arrah, what'll I do! It's off on a faint she is!"

"A deep, deep faint—Ada Leslie was dead!

She was buried by charity; and her little son Hector, heir-at-law of all these broad lands before him, was turned a beggar on the world. Poor little fellow! Too young to realize the full misery of his condition, he was very sensitive of his mother's love, and to the pangs of hunger he had often to endure. With a bundle containing one little shirt given by some kind but poor neighbour, his mother's wedding-ring marked on the inside with her initials and his father's, and a little book of religious maxims presented by the clergyman of the parish as a reward for regular attendance at the Sunday school, Hector Leslie left the cottage where his mother had breathed her last to try to find his way to London.

One afternoon, weary and hungry, he stopped at a farm-house on his way, to beg a night's rest in the barn, and a piece of bread for his supper. He timidly entered the kitchen, and with downcast eyes, and low humble tones, he told his touching story and craved relief. The party listened in silence. The mother clasped her infant closer to her breast, as she fancied one of her own little ones left so destitute; Aunt Martha, a neighbour who had happened to come in, stood waiting for the conclusion to urge his timid request; Roland, the eldest boy, whispered to his mother to give the little boy his Sunday jacket; while George and Ella stood near Aunt Martha; Ella with her cherished piece of cake, saved from some children's feast proffered to the wanderer; and George, his hands, in his pockets, trying to hide his profound sympathy with an assumption of manliness.

"Poor boy!" said Aunt Martha, "So young to be an orphan! What did you say your name was?"

"Hector Leslie," he replied. "Father died long ago; mother died only a little while ago. Here's the picture father painted of mother." And he drew from his breast a small case containing an exquisite miniature of his mother before want had marred her beauty.

"You're not like her," said Aunt Martha "Her eyes were blue and hair yellow; your eyes are black, and your hair is brown.—Perhaps you are like your father."

"Mother used to say so," he replied.—"Please, ma'am, how far is it to London?" he replied.

"London?" said Aunt Martha.—"What's such a child as you going to do in London? Have you anybody to go to there?"

"No, ma'am," he replied. "I have nobody anywhere now mother's dead; but I can get something to do there, perhaps; at least Mrs. Jenkins says so."

"Mrs. Jenkins is a simpleton!" said Aunt Martha. "What can you do?"

"I can make a fire, ma'am, and scrub the, and put up the pillows when mother is in bed so nicely, and put the sheet over her smooth, and—and—Oh, dear! I've got no mother to do it for now!" And with a deep sob, the little fellow sat down on a stool and laying his head on a chair, wept bitterly. The mother called her children away; and Hector sobbed himself to sleep.

He was still asleep when James Fothergill, the owner of the house, came in, who, as soon as he caught sight of poor Hector, shouted out, "Halloa, Lucy! where did this little chap come from?"

"It's a poor little orphan, James, who came to beg," she replied. "I should like to keep him, James. See what a little boy he is!—and he has such a frank, good face, and speaks as prettily as any little gentleman. Do let me keep him; he can take Roland's clothes after he outgrows them; and one mouth more is not much. May he stay?"

James drew his wife close to his breast. "I always loved your kind heart, Lucy," he said; "and was it not your dowry that bought the farm? You have the right to fill it, my own warm-hearted wife."

Do not smile, reader. James Fothergill, at thirty-eight the father of four children, was as warm a lover as when, eleven years before, he had asked the blushing Lucy to be his wife. Truly Hector had found a pleasant home. The good farmer and his pretty, loving wife were thankful for the bounties Heaven had showered upon them, and were no niggards in sharing them with those less fortunate. The children had their mothers warm heart and their father's free hand. Hector was taken into the hearts of all, and soon filled the place.—Frank, intelligent, and affectionate, he strove by every means in his power to prove his gratitude for the mercies granted him; and as time sped on, all forgot he was not born a son of the house. James Fothergill inquired in the place where his mother had died, and found out the boy's high birth. He went to Lord Grahame, and told him of his grandsons destitute condition, but the old man refused to see, or in any way aid, his daughters child; and the farmer returned with the news to Lucy, who having become attached to Hector, was overjoyed.

The farmer was what is called well to do in the world, that is, his farm yielded enough for him to live comfortably, and send his boys, including Hector, to the first school of the place, where there were first-rate teachers and many intelligent scholars.—Hector early showed a passionate love of learning, and outstripped in a short time, both George and Roland, though the latter's abilities were to be by no means to be despised. He was much slower than Hector, but he retained all that he learned.—George was a very active, manly boy, whose animal spirits were more prominent than his love for study. There was one accomplishment taught at the academy which Hector embraced with eager delight —this was drawing. At home or at school were his perfect pleasure; and he was never tired of sketching the scenery around the farm, and the faces of his benefactors.—When Hector was nearly fourteen years old, there came a great grief to the farm-house. Ida, the youngest daughter, was thrown from her pony, and instantly killed.

Mrs. Fothergill was seated in her own room alone, the day after her child's funeral when Hector entered with a slow, sorrowful step, and sympathy was strongly marked on his handsome face.

"Mother," he said, kneeling beside her, "I have been months painting this, but it was not finished until last night. Will you accept it?" he said placing in her hands a likeness of the lost one. Perfect in outline and coloring, and the size of life, the face seemed smiling hope from the paper to the bereaved mother, who, through her blinding tears, looked upon that dear face she had thought hidden for ever. After this event Hector, was, if possible, still more warmly cherished than before.

Two more years passed away quickly to two at the farm house, Ella and Hector who loved each other after the most approved manner of heroes and heroines from time immemorial. Hector was now a tall manly boy, with a good education, fine manners, and for one of his age, great proficiency in languages; but his ruling passion, his love, his life, I had almost said, was for his art, as he fondly termed painting. In this he had gone far beyond his masters at the academy, and practising perseveringly, sighed for opportunities to travel and study the old masters, of whose works he had read so much. Often miming him at meal times Ella would seek for him, and find him in the fields or barn, his easel before him, working busily at his pet art. Great was his delight when a neighbour, taking what he considered his masterpiece to London, sold it to an artist for an assortment of colours, brushes, canvas, and other articles for work, that seemed to Hector almost endless. He was now laboring in secret to finish a group of his benefactor and his family, his first effort in oil-colours, over which his kind would no trouble, and his cheeks flush with excitement, that he was often obliged to lay aside his pencil to still the beating of his heart.

Ella, the artist's love, as she sometimes whispered to herself, had grown from the child who had offered Hector her cake to a lovely girl of fifteen. She was very beautiful; her dark brown hair, with its profusion of soft curls, was looped back from a face that might well claim the admiration of a poet or an artist. Oval in form, with large, soft brown eyes, with that passive expression which sorrow would have made melancholy; a pure pale complexion, only on rare occasions tinged with a faint colour; regular features, and sweet expression, her face was lovely whether in repose or animated. Her form was tall and slight, and her movements were graceful. She had her mother's loving disposition, added to a reflection in her manners which did not seem to belong to a farm-house.

Roland was a tall, rather awkward boy of eighteen, not handsome, very shy and reserved, fond of books, the best mathematician who had ever left the academy, and already assisting his father by transacting all the legal work of the farm, managing the accounts, keeping the bank-book, and other business which the farmer was glad to transfer to him. George, the youngest, had left home at the age of fourteen to go to sea. He had made one voyage of two years, and had again left home for a longer cruise, just one month previous to the time I am now writing.

A great change now came in Hector's life. One evening a gentleman stopped at the farm, and requested shelter for the night, as a storm was coming up. He was received with ready hospitality and taken into the parlour. He had not been there long before his attention was attracted by the numerous drawing and water-colours, paintings hanging on the walls; and in answer to his question, Mrs. Fothergill, to Hector's shamefaced, gave him a sketch of the boy's life, omitting to mention his high birth for Hector had implored them never to speak of his grandfather's unkindness, because it was his mother's father they would condemn. Mr. Ashton the traveller, listened with interest to the story, but made no comments. Next morning he asked permission to stay a short time at the farm to make some sketches of the scenery. Sketches! The word fell on Hector's quick ear, and drew forth his eager questions.—Was their visitor an artist? Indeed he was, and no mean one as the boy soon found out. For a month he remained on the farm; and during that time Hector was too happy. He praised his pictures, said he was a genius, encouraged his efforts, and promised a glorious future if he persevered in the course he had chosen; he corrected his faults, lent him copies, took him out sketching with him, gave him numerous invaluable hints about his family picture; and, when he left the farm promised to return in a short time, what a flood of happiness he had opened for our hero! Two weeks after Mr. Ashton left the farm-house, there arrived presents from London for all the family; and Hector's was, in his eyes, perfection several books on painting, a number of steel plates and lithographs for copies, and a long letter full of encouragement and counsel.

Time sped on. Hector was nineteen when Mr. Ashton visited the farm-house. This time he came to bid them farewell; he was going abroad to Italy, and he offered to take Hector with him as his secretary, and give him the coveted opportunity of studying the old masters. After two days stay at the farm he returned to London to prepare for his journey, promising to return in a month to take his protegé, if he was willing to go. Hector's heart and brain were in a whirl of doubt and delight —delight at the enchanting prospect opened before him; doubt as to whether it would be right to leave his friends, even for this. His warm impulsive heart-seemed bursting with love and gratitude as he thought of what they had been to him; and then came the thought of Ella. Could he leave her, his love, his promised wife, whose sorrowful eyes seemed reproaching him for thinking of happiness apart from her? But Mr. Fothergill settled his doubts by commanding him to accept the offer.

"We shall miss you sadly, my boy," said the farmer, kindly; and there was a huskiness in his voice as he laid his hand on Hector's curls. "We shall miss you sadly. My own sons have never been more dutiful than the child of my adoption. No father could have loved you more tenderly than I have, or grieved more at parting with you; but it is best. You will learn much, Hector; and when you return, remember, while I have a roof over my head, there will be a place for you. Pshaw!" he said, as Hector threw himself, sobbing, into his arms, "tears are for girls, my boy! May God bless you my more than father!" said Hector, with a broken voice; and may he shower mercies on you as you have shown them unto me! Years and years of gratitude cannot repay you; but God will surely bless you for your kindness to a poor orphan lad."

There are many sore partings. Mrs. Fothergill had not wept more over Georges departure than over Hector's. And how can I paint Ella's grief?

"You will forget me," she said, sadly, as they were taking the last walk together.—"Mr. Ashton is rich and childless, and he loves you. You will become a great artist and I shall be forgotten."

Hector stood transfixed, looking at her as if he doubted her sanity. "Forget you Ella?" he said, "you the angel of my childhood, and now my betrothed! Forget you?"

"Nay, Hector, do not look so reproachfully at me. Love me always," she said as her head fell upon her breast, "love me always; for your love is my life. Oh, Hector, how can I let you go? It is best—you must go: but I feel as if it was tearing my heart out, my artist love."

He bent over her with promises of never varying love and constancy, and again and again swearing never, never to change, until she grew calmer: and when they talked hopefully of the future, when he should return a great artist to claim his bride.

It was over. Hector was on his way to Italy; and there was a great gap in the farm-house. Never had they realized so fully as now what the loving boy had been to them; they missed him at all times.

Two years more passed on, and again we return to Hector. Seated in a beautiful studio in Florence was a group of five persons—Mr. Ashton, his newly made wife, her daughter Nina, a young, beautiful Italian girl of sixteen, a fair looking Englishman, Nina Cameron's lover, and Hector —our Hector.

"So it is your twenty-first birth-day, Hector," said Ernest Grant, the young Englishman I have mentioned. "What presents have you received?"

"A hair chain from Nina, a kiss from Mrs. Ashton and this book from Mr. Ashton," replied Hector. "Now, if I could only hear from England, get some answer to the many letters I have written this last year, what a happy birthday this would be! Ah, fairies have heard me!" he added, as the servant entered, and handed him a letter post-marked in England. "Hurrah! from my friend and your employer, Mr. Ashton who is the only person in England that answers me does. Eh! what?"

"What is the matter?" said Mrs. Ashton, as Hector tore open a letter [enclosed in the former, and, after reading it, turned deadly pale, and sank into a chair.

"Read them," said Hector, hastily, handing them to Mr. Ashton, who read aloud:

"DEAR HEC.—I have but a few minutes to spare to answer your last, as most condemn the important news I send. I made inquiries for your friends, the Fothergills. The old man is dead, the farm sold, and the family scattered. Roland is gone to India as secretary for somebody, I forget whom; George was last at sea: and the widow and their daughter have left their home, and I can get no clue to them. Now for my great news. Lord Grahame is dead, and has left a will, making you heir to one of the most finest estates and largest incomes in England. You were very sly in concealing your relationship; but the lawyers advertised for you; and I went to them and so learned the great news. I enclose their letter, with which accept the heartiest congratulations of your friend,

GUS ASHTON."

The inclosed letter was from the lawyers verifying the report of his friend, and urging immediate return to England.

"So you must leave us, said Mr. Ashton handing back the letters. "Why Hector, man, what a face for such glorious things!"

"Poor Ella!" said Hector, in a low tone; "this is why I have never heard from them. My father and George both dead! Oh, Mr. Ashton, I have no heart for good news now!" Yes," he added, springing to his feet, "I must leave you; I must find her." And he left the room.

"Poor boy!" said Mrs. Ashton; "I know his heart. His love and gratitude swallow up his sense of this good news. He forgets all his own good fortune in the sorrows of his friends."

One week after this scene Hector was on his way to England. When he arrived in London after settling his business, proving his identity, and being installed in the possession of his inheritance, he took rooms in a fashionable quarter, and commenced his search for Ella. Mr. and Mrs. Ashton returned to England shortly after himself to purchase the trousseau of Nina, and see her in the new home Ernest Grant was preparing for her. Hector was very busy now, helping them, taking the lovely Italian, Mrs. Ashton (for Mr. Ashton had married an Italian widow), to the most stylish shops, and making his artist's eye useful in the selection of colors and fabrics for the bridal array.

In a small room in the suburbs of London sat Mrs. Fothergill. She was dressed in a widow's weeds, and the appearance of the room betokened poverty, though not grinding oppressive want. The furniture was neat and plain; and her own dress, though of coarse material, was well made and very nice. James Fothergill had left his widow poor, for his farm had declined during the last two years of his life, owing partly to Roland's absence in India, and his father's age being inadequate to support the burden them thrown upon him. He had insisted upon his son's acceptance of a good offer as secretary to a gentleman going to India, and bitterly felt his loss after he was gone. He died poor; and his widow was now living on what she earned as a seamstress, and Ella's wages as assistant in a milliner's shop. Roland occasionally sent sums of money, or presents as that they lived very comfortably with economy. Mrs. Fothergill was reading an advertisement of the return of Lord Grahame to his native land, and a criticism of the paintings he had brought from abroad. She was going back in fancy, to the little boy who stood with timid manner petitioning for a night's lodging and a piece of bread. Suddenly Ella entered, her face flushed, and her form trembling with excitement.

"Mother, I have seen him," she said, as she threw herself down beside her mother's chair, and then starting up again, began to pace the room hastily. "He came into the shop with two ladies to buy a bonnet for his bride. She was with him; and he selected the white one I made this week. My handiwork on his bride! Strange, is it not? She is very beautiful, a brunette, very lovely. Mother, mother! he is great, rich, noble, and he has forgotten me."

"The touching pathos in her voice brought tears to her mother's eyes. Ella sank upon a sofa, and laying her head upon her arm, moaned. The great excitement was over, and the sorrow remained.

"Mother," she said, in a low, heart-broken voice, as Mrs. Fothergill bent pityingly over her, "mother he has forgotten me! I have been true. You know that I refused a wealthy marriage twice for his sake before," she said bitterly, before I knew of his great fortune. I hoped and longed for his return; and now! This measure, too, for his long silence. He never answered the letter I wrote after I left the farm-house, when he was at Rome; and I thought it had missed him; but he was false. He loved this Italian then; Nina he called her. Mother! mother! he had forgotten me!"

She did not know that the letter she wrote to Rome missed him because he was in Florence; and his letter, telling her of the change, reached the farm-house after she had left it.

Hector, meanwhile, was standing in the milliner's shop with Nina, admiring the pretty white bonnet, and acting as interpreter between the shop-woman and his Italian friends.

"Yes, yes," said the milliner, in reply to some question, "the maker of that bonnet is my most tasty apprentice. It was a lucky day I secured the service of that young girl."

"If you will kindly have taken an order," said Hector, at a request from Nina, "the lady would like to give her particular directions about another bonnet."

"Certainly, sir. Send Miss Fothergill here," she said to the boy.

Ella Fothergill! Had he heard aright? Hector's heart beat quickly as he watched the boy's return.

"Gone home in a great hurry with the headache," [illegible]

Hector got her address from the astonished milliner, scribbled to call some other day, bowed, made room for a fine parcels of confectionery, put Miss Ashton and Nina into the carriage and followed Ella.

Mrs. Fothergill spoke fond words of comfort to her daughter; but little could [illegible] and say. "[illegible] How I loved him, mother?—How I have lived in the hope of seeing him once more? Hector! come to me, or my heart will break! He is not false; he has missed my letters; but oh, that doubt, Nina! Hector, I trusted you as my life, and you are false!"——"Ella!" said a low deep voice.

He was there, living before her, with his eyes fixed with a world of tenderness upon her face. Nina was forgotten; and with a sob of joy she sprang into his open arms. He had heard her last words as he entered; and he would not release her until he had told her all and she had sobbed her sorrow for doubting him. They were still in the room in that close embrace when a man entered. The widow's cry of "Roland!" explained who was this new arrival; and more embracing and words of welcome followed.

"Mother, said Roland, taking her hand, "you have had much joy to-night; can you bear any more? Listen! I was sitting in my room seven months ago, when a man entered, a sailor, who had been shipwrecked on one of the islands in the Pacific, picked up by a friendly, vessel, brought to India, and had found me out."

"George!" gasped the widow, "my boy George! he is with you!"

Before Roland could reply, George was in his mother's arms.

And on we will leave them, merely adding that in his prosperity Hector did not forget the friends of his childhood. After his marriage with Ella, George was placed as captain on as fine a vessel as any in the merchant service; Roland was located as a professor of mathematics in a flourishing college; while Mrs. Fothergill had a splendid home with her daughter and the "Mitherless Bairn."

The Bursting of Spring.

The following passage we copy from a recent letter in the New York Independent:—

"But I am whirling along the Hudson, a river that never wears out nay more than it runs out. If any other land has a more glorious river, I am glad of it! The ground is all disrobed of snow. Willows are yellowing the edges of low woods. Buds are making the forests look purplish. Grass is everywhere starting, and in favored spots it has lifted up that green which all summer long shall not wear out. The ploughs have already been at work. Farmers are all astir. Barn yards are vocal with hens celebrating the earliest achievements in the egg speculations of another season. Calves and lambs are come. Ah, you do not know poor creatures that live in cities—you do not know that spring has come! But the signs of the year are for the country. Now the peony is pushing up his ruddy knuckles, honey-suckles are tearing out, flags are drawing their swords, the swamps are full of black birds, wild duck are on the ponds, trout are ready for the angler, long wedgelines of wild geese stream northward trumpeting as evening come on, and they are wing weary. Br ok willows are downy with their velvety catskins—mosses in the damp woods are green with the clearest, moistest and intensest green.—Streams are full and turbid, little ones are racing down into bigger ones, and these are pouring into other streams, and everything seems hurrying and hasting as if a universal activity had inspired the year!"

SOMNAMBULISM.

The observation of sleep walking, or somnambulism, is of ancient date. Two varieties were noticed, one of which we shall pass over very briefly, as being unimportant, except as a collateral illustration: it is that where the subject of it is engaged in some occupation, which he continues, although sleep overtakes him. Thus Galen fell asleep whilst walking, and continued to do so until he struck his foot against a stone. Felix Plater relates that he himself often fell asleep whilst playing the lute, which he continued until the instrument fell and awoke him. He also states that a friend fell asleep whilst reading aloud, and read an entire page whilst sleeping. It is said to be not unusual for soldiers upon the march to fall asleep on a fatiguing journey, still keeping up with the rest. This was often noticed during the retreat from Moscow.

Hippocrates first notices the true somnambulism, the imitation of action in accordance with sleeping ideas. Aristotle also notices it.

It is most ordinary to find that those acts which are habitual by day are most frequently reenacted by night. Of these the simplest are those connected with visiting the usual scenes of labor. Some will descend the shafts of mines, others will ride on horseback, walk, pass dangerous places which they could not have accomplished when awake, and perform the most complex mechanical operations, such as watch, nothing, &c. Some will even swim during sleep; Dr. Franklin relates one such instance about himself; and Macnish, in his Philosophy of Sleep, gives an account of a man who walked over a rough and dangerous road nearly two miles, and then plunged into the water, where he swam a mile and a half before he was pinked up still fast asleep. In general terms the somnambulist may perform all the acts, however complex of which he is capable during the day, and even execute purposes which would be quite beyond his power in his waking moments; he may enter into conversation with the bystanders, and manifest a certain modified activity of any or all of the senses, as in recognizing persons and things, and avoiding obstacles; he may then return to bed, and when he awakes have no consciousness of anything that has passed. Such is generally the case, but not invariably; sometimes the somnambulism is marked by the power of recollection, which is remembered (but only as a dream), on awaking. Macnish relates the story of a boy who, dreaming that he got out of bed and commenced to eat the contents of the sugar-basin entirely, whilst his friend on awaking found him actually engaged with his face plunged in a sugar-basin.

One of the most remarkable cases on record is related by the Archbishop of Bordeaux in the Encyclopedie Methodique.—It was concerning a young priest in the Catholic seminary, who used to rise in his sleep and write sermons. Having written a page, he would read it aloud and make corrections. "I have seen (says the archbishop,) the beginning of one of his sermons which he had written when asleep; it was well composed, but one correction surprised me. Having written at first the words 'on divin enfant,' he had afterwards altered the word divin and written over it adorable.—Then perceiving that or could not stand before the last word, he had dexterously inserted a t, so as to make the word out."—He continued to write, although a card was held between his eyes and the paper. Did the history stop here, we should have a well authenticated case of vision without the aid of the eyes. But the collateral circumstances show that this writing was accomplished, not by sight; but by a most accurate mental representation of the object to be attained, as will be further illustrated in our next case. For after he had written a page requiring correction, a piece of blank paper of the exact size was substituted for his own manuscript, and on that he made the corrections in the precise situation which they would have occupied on the original page. A very astonishing part of this report is that which relates to his writing music in this sleeping state, which it is said he did with perfect precision. He asked for certain things, and saw and heard such things, but only such things as bore directly upon the subject of his thoughts. He detected the deceit when water was given to him instead of brandy, which he had asked for. Finally, he found nothing of all that had transpired when he awoke; but to his great surprise he remembered all accurately, and so lived a sort of double life, a phenomenon which we believe to be universal in all the cases of exalted somnambulism.

A STRANGE STORY.—An English lady has just arrived at the city of St. Louis, Missouri, in search of her husband, who left her in England, and came to this country. She had not heard from him for a long time, and was unable to find out his whereabouts. She came to this city, and found him living with another woman, whom he had married. The lady has returned to England.

Appalling Catastrophe.

LOSS OF THE POMONA.

The weather during the past few days has been of the most boisterous character, the gales of wind prevailing on Wednesday and Thursday were so violent as to cause great apprehension at various shiping distr[icts] might result therefrom. This view has been unfortunately borne out by the occurence of thursday and yesterday, and it now becomes our painful and melancholy duty to chronicle the total destruction of a large emigrant ship, and the loss of upwards of 380 human lives, in our own immediate neighborhood. The [illegible] clipper-ship Pomona, 1,500 tons burden, of New York, left Liverpool on Wednesday with a crew of 30 sailors in addition to the captain, Charles Merryew, and passengers for New York, to the number of about 380. She left the Mersey with fair and full breeze, and everything seemed to be going on well up to a late hour, when almost in a moment, the hopes of her living freight were blighted, the ship struck, and thing but death and desolation lay before us.—Many of the passengers and a portion of the crew had retired to their respective berths at an early hour, but a large number more cheerfully inclined had congregated together in the saloons and were singing and dancing up to a late hour, there being both ladies and piper on board. As the night advanced, however, the breeze freshened into a gale, before which the gallent ship flew as it were towards her destination, and many of the remaining passengers turned in. By some means, which at present we have been unable to ascertain with accuracy, the captain, when nearing Tuscar, seems to have lost his reckoning and mistaken his position, for a little past midnight the ship was driven on to a sandbank some seven miles off Ballyconigar, near to blackwater, the sea making a clear breach over her and sweeping her decks. The passengers rushed in crowds to the deck, most of them but partially dressed, and many with there night-clothes on. For a short time a wild scene of terror and confusion ensued, which however, gradually subsided as the calm orders of the captain were obeyed by the crew, and something like order was re-established. The pumps were quickly manned, and it was found that the vessel was fast making water, but the Captain was in hopes that if the weather moderated he should be able in the morning to land all his passengers by means of his boats. In this, however, he was doomed to be disappointed, as the gale continued with increased fury during the whole of the day. In the course of the morning an attempt was made to launch the lifeboats but they were stove in and their crew drowned. In this fearful state of suspense they remained till towards evening when the ship, which had till then remained firm on the bank, slipped off by the stern into deep water, and commenced rapidly to fill. The whale boat was then launched, and a number of the crew and passengers rushed into her. The captain, in hope of being again driven on to the bank, let go the last bower anchor, but all his exertions were fruitless, and though more than 40 men were toiling at the pumps the water gained upon them so fast that in less than another hour[illegible] The heartrending scenes that must have occurred during that hour are fearful to think of, but they are known only to God, for beyond those in the boat not a soul was saved. The captain and first and second mates remained on the sinking ship, the only officer in the boat being the third mate, Stephen Kelly, who succeeded in reaching the shore in company with 18 others of the crew and three passengers, five being washed out in their passage from the vessel.

Mr. Harper, the agent for Lloyd's was early at the scene of the disaster, in company with Mr. William Coghlan, under whose directions the survivors, all of whom are more or less suffering from severe personal injuries, were removed to Wexford, where they will no doubt receive that sympathy to which their sufferings so justly entitle them. Among those saved, the names of whom we give below, there are only three passengers; and of the seamen preserved there are several who are Irish, a number of the crew being natives of this country. One of the sailors on board the Pomona was a Wexford man, named Michael Hayer; he was drowned in the futile attempt made to launch the life-boat of the ship. On arriving at Wexford the third mate made the following statement upon oath, which was taken down by Mr. Coghlan, to whose kindness we are indebted for a copy:

Stephen Kelly deposed that he was third mate of the ship Pomona, of New York, of 1,500 tons register, owned by the D. L. line, and that he sailed from Liverpool on the 27th day of April, at 5 A. M., with a crew of 37 hands, including himself, bound for New York, with a cargo of general merchandize, and about 400 passengers, shipped by sundry persons of Liverpool, and consigned to sundry persons at New York. Did not know whether she was insured. Left Liverpool on the 27th of April, at 5 a. m., wind S. E., fresh breeze. About 4 p. m., Holyhead bore about S. E. by E. distant about 10 miles, steering then, I think, about a W. S. W. course. At midnight a strong breeze, ship under close-reefed topsails, laying to. Made a revolving light, and supposed it to be Tuskar; squared away with the ship, and steered a west course. Very soon after she struck; could not tell where, but proved after wards to be Blackwater Bank, where the sea soon made a clean breach over her. About 10 a. m. cut away the fore and main mast the ship rolling very heavily. Got out two boats, but they were soon swamped. About 4 p. m. she worked over the bank; immediately after let go the best bower anchor, but found that she was sinking fast. At 1. 30 p. m. got out the long-boat, when the cook, stewards, boatswain and three others left in her; she upset going ashore, and four of them were drowned Myself, 15 of the crew and passengers, left the boat at 2. 30 p. m. in the whale boat, and landed near Blackwater. I expect the remainder of the crew and passengers are drowned. The pumps were constantly working during the day.

Shooting the Birds.

It is our fellow-citizens that any man will kill a robin, lark, finch, or small bird of any kind in the country, for a house lot. We say a man; for boys are rude and thoughtless, and their acts of destructiveness are the fore-runners of the love of [illegible] and the love of action, and are not [illegible] But a man who will kill the robin is a possible pirate. "The notes of the robin in spring are universally known, and as universally beloved," says Wilson.—Nuttal says of him—"The confidence he reposes in us by making his abode in our gardens and orchards, the frankness and innocence of his manners, beside his vocal powers to please, inspire respect and attachment even in the truant school-boy, and his exposed nest is but rarely molested."

The robin and the bob-o'-link are the two characteristics in our early summer scenery, that who that hath not a heart as dry as the dust that doth not delight in both? What gaiety and animation the robin gives to our gardens, orchards and lawns in June! How full of life they are, with their quick darting plumage, and their varied and overflowing song! What prettier sight is there than to see them running through the young grass, taller than themselves, and emerging upon a swept walk, and showing the whole of their trig and cleanly turned figures! How full of charming pertness is the way in which they turn up their pretty heads and turn their bright, restless eyes from side to side, as if saying, "I am a handsome fellow and I know it; do, please, admire me."—And then the song of the robin is so cheerful and cordial. He is not a brilliant bravura performer, like the bob-o'-link, that huddles forth his joyous heart in such precipitated notes, as if the longest summer day would not be long enough for him to unravel all the web of music that lies folded in his quivering frame; nor has he the sweet, pathetic, soul-like voice of his countryman, the ferruginous thrush—that Jenny Lind of the feathered tribe over whose exquisite song a shade of human feeling seems to pass, like the shadow of a cloud over the stream; but his notes are joyous, honest and domestic. He is a fine old-fashioned mad-singer, not remarkable for tenderness or depth of brilliant execution, but he pleases all by the charms of nature, truth and simplicity.

For two or three weeks this very year, one of these birds used to perch on the iron fence which is built around the garret scuttle of a house near our own, and greet the rising sun with a martin hymn. His song was the first sound we heard when the soul crept back into the world of consciousness; and heard at that calm and silent hour it was inexpressibly touching and sweet. It was like the voice of an angel flung out of some rift in the sky and filling the whole vault of air with overflowing song. The heart that heard it went up to heaven on the wings of that musical note; for the sweet creature seemed to be singing for all the little world around him a hymn of praise, and to be thanking God for the gift of another day. We were the latter man all the day for the baptism of its voice, and we could no more have shot that bird than we could have shot our neighbor's baby that is just beginning to put greeting to us with his fat little hands.

Some persons prompt to justify their avincidal propensity on the ground that birds eat fruit, and therefore do harm to man and his works. If this means that there is any bird under God's heaven, that in the course of his life does more harm than good to man—we meet the pocket of man—it is a mistake. The plan of God in his creation is full of wisdom and of minute and carefully adjusted wisdom. There is a balance and proportion among the various tribes of the animal creation, which cannot be disturbed. Robins do cherries, it is true; what a shocking instance of human depravity it is! how very badly a robin must have been brought up that will steal cherries; but we would rather see robins eat cherries any day than eat them ourselves.

A knot of jolly feathered gourmands, rioting, and junketing in a cherry tree, laughing and chattering and cracking jokes among themselves doubtless at the expense of the good easy man that planted the tree, and counted upon having some of the fruit, is better than a poor play—better than many cherries. But robins not only eat cherries, but they eat worms, grubs and caterpillars; and it is the same with other birds. Between the feathered creation and the insect creation there is a proportion fixed by Infinite wisdom and goodness, and short-sighted man only makes matters worse when he attempts to disturb it. If the numbers of the birds be diminished, that of the insects which do injury to the products of agriculture will be proportionately increased. Spare them, the birds, ye farmers, not merely for the sake of your own children—not merely for the sake of your own better natures—but for the sake of your apple trees, your cornfields, and your kitchen gardens.—Boston Courier.

SUPPOSED FORGERY AND PARRICIDE!

Brantford, 16th May, 7 a m.

As early as the hour is, people have arrived in the Town from the country, and are conversing about the arrest of a young man named William Robertson, who has been taken into custody on a charge of having forged his father's will about two years ago. I have gleaned the following particulars from persons of unquestionable credibility. It appears that a farmer named Robertson lived not far distant from Mount Pleasant, a few miles from Brantford. He was possessed of considerable property and had a grown up son, who was not remarkable for his observance of moral obligations or parental authority. Mr. Robertson was returning from Brantford, and was intoxicated. He did not reach home at the hour he was expected, and on the following morning his body was found lying on the roadside, adjoining a Mr. Cook's residence.

An inquest was held and evidence of the most conclusive nature adduced that a foul murder had been committed. The body presented sevr al marks of violence, including severe contusions and a stab in the region of the breast, which of itself was sufficient to cause death, and, was apparently inflicted with a dirk knife. A brother of the young man now in custody, was strongly suspected of being the perpetrator of the crime, and was arrested on the Coroner's warrant, but was subsequently released for want of sufficient inculpatory evidence. A will, purporting to have been made by the deceased was produced, and has since been ascertained to be a forgery, and to have been drawn out by some member of the family—supposed by the prisoner. Since the decease of Mr. Robertson, the prisoner and his mother, wife of the murdered man, have not lived on very friendly terms, and she has lodged information against her son charging him with having murdered his father for the purpose of becoming possessed of a portion of the estate. I hope to be able to furnish additional particulars before I close.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

12 O'clock, Noon.

W. B. Mathews, Esq., has taken the matter in hand, and hopes are entertained that the examination, which is being conducted very cautiously, will lead to the discovery of the perpetrators of the murder. The primary charge against the prisoner is of having forged the will, but we believe that the authorities expect shortly to be in possession of facts which will fix the crime on a certain individual, and thus bring to light one of the foulest deeds which has been committed in Brant since the Mohawk Valley resounded with the Indian war whoop. Several farmers are still arriving, and great interest is manifested in the proceedings. James Weyms, ——Johnstone and James Laughrey, Esqrs., aided Mr. Matthews in the investigation. The name of the prisoner is William Wallace Robertson. He is a young man, apparently about 26 years of age, and when arrested, denied that he was guilty of the forgery.

Mrs. Sarah Robertson, mother of the prisoner, deposed that William had admitted to her that he had forged the late Mr. Robertson's will. This admission was made some time after the will was made. The will was found by the children in a desk which had been previously searched; but Mrs. Robertson, from the beginning, doubted that the will was ever made by her late husband, as if it were genuine, it would not have been found in a place which had been previously searched so well.

Mr. Robertson was killed in November, 1854, and before he died he said that he would leave his property in a way that she [his widow] and little children would be well taken care of. She also saw the prisoner copying a bona fide will, which had been made by the deceased. The only reason assigned for copying the will was, that his father had not written it in a legible manner. This will was declared by Squire Johnson to be useless, as there were no signatures to it, and nothing was ever said afterwards about the will until the one which is supposed to be forged was discovered. The prisoner always asserted more right to the property than any other of the children. Several other witnesses are to be examined, and it is expected that revelations will be made which will throw considerable light upon the murder of Mr. Robertson.

Death of Alexander von Humboldt.

The Canada brings sad verification of the [illegible] prophecy, uttered a year since by Baron von Humboldt, in regard to the probable period of his own death. A remarkable presentiment that the year 1859 would be the end of his life, found casual expression, and has been fulfilled. Our dispatches this morning announce that venerable savant expired at Berlin, on Friday May 6th in his 91st year.

Frederick Henry Alexander von Humboldt was born in Berlin, Sept. 14, 1769. His father, Major von Humboldt, held the office of Chamberlain to Frederick the Great, and his early years of the son were passed under the tution of Campe, on the ternal estate at Tegel, near Berlin. In 1786, when in his sixteenth year, Alexander entered the University of Frankfort-on-the-Order, with his brother William; remained in that institution for two years, and when then transferred to the University of Gottingen. In the latter, he made the acquaintance of the naturalists Blumenbach and Forster, and through the friendship of these distinguished men, was enabled to cultivate his natural tastes for scientific study. The brothers quitted college in 1789. William had conceived a fancy for political life, and departed for Paris. Alexander, whose education had been especially directed with a view to employment in the Government mines, followed the bent of his inclinations for travel and discovery, and, in company with Forster, made his first scientific journey to the Rhine, through Holland and to England, early in the ensuing year. His first literary productions, Mineralogical Observations on some Basaltic Formations of the Rhine, was the fruit of this journey. Returning home he was sent to Hamburgh to acquire a knowledge of commercial affairs, studied book-keeping at an Institute, afterwards removed to Freeburg, and became a student in the Mining Academy, where he remained until 1792. In that year, at the age of 23 years, he was appointed Superintendant of the Mines in Franconni, an office which he held for three years. During this period, he zealously prosecuted his mineralogical and botanical studies, and made various experiments on the physical and chemical laws of metallurgy. In 1795 he resigned his office, in order to devote himself to the subjects of scientific research which had always been present to his mind. The plan of his great American journey seems to have been suggested during the period of his early intimacy with Forster; and having freed himself from the cares of public duty, he set himself to the work of the necessary preparations for that expedition. The first step was a series of scientific explorations in different parts of Europe, undertaken with a view to [illegible] his knowledge and improving his powers of observation. He made several visits to Switzerland and the mountains of Silesia, and afterwards managed the burden of an official visit to Prussian Poland. The yearning desire to see strange lands and to devote himself to scientific exploration, is well described by himself in the opening chapter of his Personal Narrative:

"From my earliest youth, I felt an ardent desire to travel into distant regions, seldom visited by Europeans. The desire is characteristic of a period of our existence when life appears an unlimited horizon, and when we find an irresistible attraction in the impetuous agitation of the mind, and the image of positive danger. Though educated in a country which has no direct communication with either the East or the West Indies, living amid mountains remote from coasts, and celebrated for his numerous mines, I felt an increasing passion for the sea and distant expeditions.—Objects with which we are acquainted only by the animated narratives of travelers have a peculiar charm; imagination wanders with delight over that which is vague and undefined; and the pleasure we are deprived of seem to possess a fascinating power, compared with which all we daily feel in the narrow circles of edentary life appears instipid."

Serious preparations for the journey to America were not possible, in consequence of family causes; the death of his mother, and the disposition of the paternal estates, until the year 1797. In that year Humboldt supplied himself with ample means for his new enterprise by the sale of the large inheritence which had fallen to him, and set out with his brother for a preliminary journey to Italy. On reaching Vienna, however, further progress was found to be impracticable, in consequence of the war then raging between France and Austria, and Alexander passed the Winter of 1797-8 in Salzburg. In the following Spring, receiving intelligence of the contemplated expedition of Baudin, intended for the exploration of the Southern Hemisphere, he hastened to Paris, but was again fated to meet with disappointment. The expedition was abandoned, and Humboldt saw no immediate prospect of carrying his enterprise into effect. During his stay in Paris, on this occasion, however, fortune favoured him in one respect. He became acquainted with Bonpland, his future companion to South America, who had been appointed to the corps of naturalists to accompany Baudin's expedition. A close friendship sprang up between Bonpland and Humboldt. They entered together on a career of preparatory study, and Humboldt united at the same time with the celebrated Gay-Lussac in a series of experiments on the atmosphere. In the fall of 1798, Humboldt, accompanied by Bonpland, went to Marseilles with the intention of embarking for Egypt, to join the scientific corps which accompanied the army of Napoleon. But another disappointment awaited him. The Swedish frigate in which he had been offered a passage, had been delayed by a storm, had put into a Portugese port to repair damages, and could not sail until the following Spring. After a delay of two months, the two friends, disliking the prospect of inaction in Marseilles, resolved to spend the Winter in Spain, and proceeded to Madrid, taking astronomical and borometrical observations by the way.

This journey to Madrid proved a bit.—After three successive disappointments, Humbolt found himself in a position far better than any he had hoped for. The Prime Minister, Urquizo, a man of enlightened sagacity, lent a willing ear to the memorial presented by the disappointed traveler supported the project, overcame obstacles, and obtained for Humboldt enlarged privileges for undertaking a voyage to the New World and the Philipine Islands. "Never," says Humboldt, "had so extensive a permission been granted to any traveller, and never had any foreigner been honored with more confidence on the part of the Spanish Government." Humboldt accompanied by Bonpland, left Madrid in May, 1799, for Corunna, where the corvette Pizzarro lay, ready to receive him. The vessel was bound to Havana and Mexico, but her Captain received orders to touch at the Canaries, and allow the travelers time to ascend the Peak of Teneriffe. Humboldt was now thirty years of age. The delays and disapointments which he had been compelled to encounter had not only been better fitted for him for the task he had undertaken, by affording him leisure to enlarge his stock of knowledge, but had furnished him in Bonpland, an able assistant and a fast friend. Humboldt has touchingly recorded his sensations, as he found himself fairly in the way of realising the hopes of years. The vessel touched at the Canaries, the travelers ascended the Peak, recorded their observations, narrowly escaped capture by British vessels, and departed for Havana. A malignant fever which broke out on shipboard, however, occasioned a change in the destination. The vessel bore away for Venezuela, and the travelers met a favourable reception in that province, where they arrived in July, 1799. They immediately began their explorations, the history of which is familiar. The exploration of the Orinoco, from which so many interesting discoveries resulted, was undertaken in November following. Some months were passed in general observations upon the seacoast, but in February, 1800, Humboldt, still accompanied by Bonpland, struck into the interior, traversing vast plains under a heat so intense that the journey was made chiefly by night, and on the 4th of April, after enduring extraordinary hardships, entered the Orinoco. On the 10th of April the travelers began a canal exploration of that River, voyaged on the Rio Negro and the Cassiquiare, and finally reached the tributary streams of the Amazon was fortunately relinquished; after the travelers had fallen into the hands of the Brazilian officials, who had received orders from the jealous Government to seize them and transport them to Lisbon. The little party started on its return on the 10th of May, and arrived at Angostura on the 16th of the following June. Thence they sailed for Havana, where they arrived in the middle of December. Tidings of the departure of Baudin's expedition from France reached Humboldt during his sojourn in Cuba, and he determined to sail for Carthagena, cross the Isthmus to the Pacific, and await the arrival of the expedition at Lima or Valparaiso. This journey gave occasion for the famous travels among the Andes. Reaching Carthagena on the 30th March, 1801, Humboldt relinquished his purpose of proceeding across the Isthmus to Panama, and chose instead the route to Guayaquil, by way of Bogota and Quito. This change of direction gave him an opportunity to trace the map of the Rio Magdalena. On the 22nd of June, the ascent of Chimborazo was made. The next step was the exploration of the chain of the Andes, undertaken after the reception of further news from the unlucky expedition of Baudin, which, after all, showed its course, and did not touch at Chili or Peru. A [illegible] to take care of itself." He states that he had often seen it [illegible] He had taken his dogs over the ground where he had just before seen them pass, and they would take no notice of the track, and could not be induced to follow when taken to the spot, while they would instantly discover the track of any deer not having young ones. This is but one proof of the adaptation of the natural laws to preserve life when it most needs protection.

THE NEAPOLITAN EXILES—AN AFFECTING INCIDENT.

In the course of an interesting letter addressed by the Duke de Cabellino to the Cork Daily Reporter, in which he gives an account of the sufferings endured by Baron Poerio, himself, and other victims in the stifling dens of Monte Fusco, the following incident is narrated:—"A nightingale, as if on a mission from Nature, apparently feeling for our sorrows and solitude, used to come to the boughs of a mulberry tree, and with his plantive song he expressed our grief, so that he became our friend—the very friend of our hearts. We used to throng the prison bars to listen to and treasure his loving plaint. Ah, fond fool! he with his slender ditty awakened suspicions that had communicated with the outer world—a blessing, indeed, which the treaty had ended for us. They shouted with their voices, and hurled sticks, but in the evenings the little nightingale came again and again with his solace to us, and his sympathy for patriotism brought his doom—he was shot."

Our Commercial Prospects.

Even though we had not before us the almost absolute certainty of a long and fierce warfare, which may for years say the energy and exhaust the resources of the chief nations of the continent of Europe, there is enough in the present commercial position and future commercial prospects of this country to cause all classes carefully to guard against any approach to those extravagances of expenditure or speculation which, in former years, brought so much evil upon them. For the price of provisions of all kinds to be at the highest rates, would be, on the whole, rather a matter for congratulation than cause for anxiety. were garners full and our store-houses overflowing; or even if we had a certain assurance that the incoming crop not devoured by the fly nor wasted by the rust or mildew, would be safely harvested and yield not only enough for all the demands for home consumption, but also afford such a surplus as would, at the prices we may naturally expect for some months to come, pay our debts and relieve us from the monetary pressure which now cripples our resources. The experience of the past, however, and the knowledge of the existing state of affairs, do not warrant us in indulging too sanguine expectations. In the first place we must remember that at the present moment there is not flour in the country sufficient for our own use until the new wheat comes in. At various points on Lake Huron and Lake Ontario, our millers are at this moment grinding wheat purchased at Chicago, Cleveland, Oswego and other ports of the American side, not for exportation but for the supply of local wants. Montreal is buying flour largely at Oswego and Rochester for her own use, and in many parts of the back country flour owing to the prevailing scarcity, fetches as high a price as in the markets on the front. Nine shillings a bushel may sometimes therefore be a price as ruinous to the country, as under other circumstances it would be advantageous, and it is evident that having now to pay that price for foreign wheat a large profit that may be made out of the coming harvest will have been anticipated. But supposing all present difficulties provided for let us look a little further. We are ourselves inclined to think, as we have before stated, that the estimate commonly made of the growing crop is somewhat exaggerated and that as a whole it will not be so much above an average as some people imagine. Admitting, however, its present condition to be most promising, we must not, and ought not to shut our eyes to the fact that, judging from all human probability, all experience of the past, the ravages of the fly will, unless averted by Providence, be at least as destructive as they were last year. We have yet found no cure for the evil, and we know that as a matter of history, the insect has been gradually creeping Westward, that last year it had found its way where it had never been seen before, and that it will probably go on in the same proportion. On the other hand it is true that the wheat this year is in a very forward and healthy condition, that the weather has lately been very favorable to it as well as to the spring crops, which have been sown unusually early, and under the most favorable auspices, and thus the evil may, to a certain extent be averted. That this may be altogether the case we sincerely trust; but what we wish to impress upon our readers is the necessity for continued caution and the closest economy, and the danger lest high prices, and the hope of an abundant harvest, should teach our farmers, in whose hands is, under Providence, the fate of the whole community, to indulge in that expenditure which, while temporarily promoting general activity, is likely to lead, as it has just now done, to ultimate ruin. While thus with the acknowledged scarcity existing, and the very uncertain prospects of the next harvest, we urge the absolute necessity of prudence and economy in every possible way for some time to come, if we would extricate ourselves from present difficulties, it is cheering to reflect upon the immunity from very extensive commercial disaster which we have so far enjoyed. It is true that a great deal of distress still exists, and that the commercial position of the country is hazardous indeed, but who will say that having weathered the storm so long we cannot with care do so till the end?—The very fact that the country has so long maintained its position under the adverse state of existing circumstances, proves how great are our resources, and it is not now the time, when we have a prospect of relief before us, that we should cease to tax our endurance, or to husband our means to the uttermost.

Now let us take the most favorable view of the case. For the first time in the history of America, she is importing breadstuffs from Europe, and let the war end when it will the prices of everything must rule high, and our surplus produce of all kinds fetch remunerative prices for at least a year to come. Supposing, also the most sanguine expectations as to the next harvest to be fulfilled, we have one side of the balance an abundant harvest and high prices. On the other, we have to charge the purchases requisite for a quarter's home supply, and the clearing off of old debts, to accomplish which will, at any rate, require all our exertions and all our care. Previously, then, in the ratio that our means fall below these favorable calculations must greater care and economy be exercised, for the debit side will remain the same.

What the effect of a protracted war may be upon our finances, so far as Europe is concerned, it is difficult to say, but of this we may rest assured, that upon the Religious Troubles in a College.

A religious difficulty has sprung up in the Agricultural College of Michigan. The institution has eighty-one students. Six-sevenths of these have addressed a pitition to the Faculty, asking a return to an original rule, which requested all the clergy of Lansing to officiate in turn in the religious exercises at the Institution on Sunday, including the Rev. Mr. Knickerbocker, (Universalists,) who has been excluded.—The reverend gentleman named has published a pamphlet, which sets forth his view of the case. He addresses the State Board of Education, and says: "It remains for you to decide whether two or three sects shall convert the Agricultural College to uses in so unwarrantable a manner. The last Legislature, in which was many liberal Christians, and some Catholics, appropriated $37,500 for this College, which would not have been done, had they even imagined that the College had been or could be converted into an instrument for the propagation or advancement of sectarian dogmas or creede.

The death of Colonel Joseph Park, principal Chief of the Shawnee tribe of Indians was recently noticed. He died in Kansas. The Detroit Tribune gives some interesting particulars of his life. He was once a resident of Michigan, and during the war of 1812, while his tribe was living in Northern Ohio, Joe was employed by the American officers as interpreter, guide, and confidential express messenger. He enjoyed the esteem and confidence of General Cass, by vice, and he accompanied that officer in his memorable expedition to the sources of the Missippi in 1820, when the whole territory north of Ohio contained less than nine thousand souls.

Spread of our Language.

The spread of the English language is a remarkable fact in the providential dealings of the Most High with mankind. Its study increasing over all Europe. It is the mother tongue of the United States, as well as of the British Isles, and prevails over the whole of the vast colonies of North America appended to the British crown. It is the language of many of the West India islands, and is heard, more or less, in all the centres of commercial activity in South America. It is the tongue of the infant empires of Australia, Van Dieman's Land and New Zealand, and appears destined to overspread the whole Polynesian island groups. From the Cape it is moving upward into the interior of Africa; and into whatever part Dr. Livingstone pierces from the West, he will carry with him not only the merchandise but the speech of his country. Along the Egyptian highway to Asia, it is becoming a familiar sound. Throughout all India, from Cape Comorin to the Himalayas, it is being acquired by the most active and influential of the native population; and in five of the crowded ports of China it is one of the dialects of everyday life. Wherever the English tongue is spoken, its literature finds its way. Hence it is no exaggeration to say that the preparations of a Christian literature in the English language is an object of world-wide importance.

What our Forefathers thought of Tobacco.

The following is extracted from the proceedings and debates in the House of Commons:

"Wednesday, April 18, 1621—Sir W. Stroud moved that he "would have tobacco banished wholly out of the Kingdom, and that it may not be brought in from any part nor used among us; and Sir Grey Palmer said that "if tobacco be not banished, it will overthrow one hundred thousand men in England; for now it is so common that he had seen ploughmen take it as they are at the plough."

Curious Fact.

An old Canadian hunter declares that the reason why the wild deer are not all killed when young (as they breed once a year, and are always surrounded by other animals which prey upon them, as dogs, wolves, foxes, panthers, &c.,) is, that "every doe or other animal observed the track of Kidding cows can be cured of the habit for the time being, and perhaps permanently, by bringing a common draft chain just forward of the hips, before milking.

For warts on a cows udders, writes a correspondent, a cure can be effected by simply washing them after milking, with brine, for one or two weeks.

To keep bugs from cucumber and melon beds:—Cover the ground, under the vines, two or three inches deep, with fine sand.

To prevent sheep from scouring when first turned to grass in the Spring, give no salt from the time they are turned out until after shearing,—or, what perhaps is better, let them have access to salt at all times, summer and winter.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 18 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICES.

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1858.

THE SUBSCRIBERS beg to inform the late customers of Mr. Thomas Bennett, and the public in general, that they have entered into partnership, and have made arrangements with him to succeed him in his business. They desire to commence with fewer items with their custom, that their wants will be punctually attended to, and their work done in a manner that will ensure satisfaction. They will always be found ready to receive orders, and they hope by such attention to their interest to receive a share of the public patronage.

All kinds of country produce kept constantly on hand, and sold on the most reasonable terms for Cash or their approved notes.

Remember the old stand opposite the Bagnera entrance to the Town Hall.

Scenes in Japan.

During the ride to the temple of Dai-nee, we might have seen at least 80,000 Japanese, the majority of them men—yet no one had noticed a crippled, deformed, or leprous person. The writer was careful to count all those Japanese whom he saw during that day suffering from infirmities arising from disease—such, for instance, as loss of eyesight from small-pox. The entire number, incredible as it may appear, amongst so many human beings, fell considerably short of a hundred. Pock marks were common, but by no means general.

Only two beggars were seen in this ride of fully 22 miles: one was a mendicant priest, too aged to wander about, and he was seated under a tree by the wayside, beating the discordant wooden drum used in Buddhist temples, and mumbling over endless prayers; and the other beggar was a very venerable and decrepid old woman. This was all the downright poverty we heard or saw in Yedo; and we can hardly believe that the paupers were put out of sight during the stay of the English.

If squalor and poverty were not to be found in Yedo, neither was their ostentatious magnificence or extravagance amongst the higher and wealthier classes. In the audience chamber of the Prince of Bitsu, or in the official procession of an imperial commissioner going to an interview with Lord Elgin, there was no gaudy display of bright-colored silks or satins, no glitter of gold and silver, yet there was abundance of ceremony, and invariably a well-dressed retinue. The Japanese men may be said to be the Quakers of the East, from the sombre color and style of their dress; and the contrast between the tawdry magnificence of Chinese mandarins, and the simple yet ordinary array of a high Japanese functionary, was very striking.

There were many instances of the wonder excited by the novelty, and (as they owned) by the superiority of the strangers. Yenoske, the interpreter, had often to blush at what he called the ill-manners of his countrymen, but he assured us that in three or four years' time they would behave much better. Poor souls, it would perhaps have been unreasonable to have resented their inquisitiveness; and if we ever did so, they immediately recalled us to our senses by a good-humoured laugh. No doubt the priests, who, with their families (for priests in Japan are allowed to marry) were living in the enclosure of the same temple, turned to profitable account the spectacle we afforded to their friends and neighbours. There was no objection to gratify all reasonable curiosity, and arrangements were made that our only apartment should be thrown open for an audience immediately after the morning ablutions were completed. This express stipulation that a Briton taking his bath was to form no part of the morning's entertainment, was made in consequence of one of our party having unconsciously, for several mornings, been shown to various parties of Japanese ladies, in such light costumes as might enable them to assure themselves of the fact that his skin was quite as fair as his face and hands promised. All the wonders of the dressing table from stropping a razor to putting eau-de-cologne upon a pocket-handerchief were freely exhibited. A jolly old priest laughed immoderately at our applying such a spirit to so ignoble a purpose, and tried to enlighten the foreigners as to its proper use, by tossing off any quantity that might be poured into the palm of his hand. The ladies were especially delighted with scented soaps and hair brushes, and the gentlemen looked upon boots and gilt buttons as marvels which it was highly desirable the Japanese nation should learn to manufacture as soon as possible.

A little shed was constructed in the corner of the back-garden, and here a priest was permanently posted to watch our doings, while at night a policeman with a bamboo rattle joined him, and disturbed our rest with hourly tunes upon his instrument. We had, like the cats, just become accustomed to this infliction, when, one night, the bleating of a goat awoke us so often, that we sprang out of bed, wishing the policeman's rattle down his throat, and vowing vengeance on the beast. Stepping out into the balcony which ran round the apartment, we saw a white goat trotting over the grass and flower-beds, bleating incessantly, while the priest and policemen were addressing it in Japanese, and the former occasionally threw up his arms, and made reverent obeisances to the brute.—We had ready a pair of stout boots to pelt the goat with, but they fell harmless from our hands, for we almost jumped to the conclusion that the goat was an incarnation of Buddha, and to touch it would be sacrilege. Mentally anathematising all the noisy objects of boisterous worship, we besought the priest and policeman to persuade their four-legged deity to remove its sacred presence to another part of the premises. They understood us, and with awe-struck faces, which the bright starlight enabled us to see, proceeded to carry out our wishes. They approached most cautiously, making all sorts of cooing and wheedling noises—but directly the goat showed the slightest inclination to resist, or drooped its head as if to butt, it prostrated priest and policeman, and hid themselves until we cheered them again on to the fray. At last the animal was expelled, and sighed as he returned to his hut, as if what he had done was "so canny;" and all this so confirmed us in our supposition, that when the goat again returned at dawn and bleated, we only pulled the bed-clothes over our head, and hoped for the speedy enlightenment of the obstinate worshippers of Nanny-goats.

The Japanese use neither silk nor cotton handkerchiefs, towels and dusters; paper in their hands serves as an excellent substitute. It is soft, thin, tough, of a pale yellow colour, very plentiful and very cheap. The inner walls of many a Japanese apartment are formed of paper, being nothing more than painted screens: their windows are covered with a fine translucent description of the same material: the floors are hung on the manufacture of gaudy coverings, as a Japanese housekeeper; and we saw what seemed bales of cotton, which were nothing but long shreds of tough paper rolled up. If a shop-keeper had a parcel to tie up, he would take a strip of paper, roll it quickly between his hands, and use it for the purpose, and it was quite as strong as the ordinary string used at home. In short, without paper, all Japan would come to a dead-lock; and indeed, less by the arbitrary exercise of his authority a tyrannical husband should stop his wife's paper, the sage Japanese mothers-in-law invariably stipulate in the marriage-settlement, that the bride is to have allowed to her a certain quantity of paper.

Terrible Fight with a Rattlesnake.

We have hitherto supposed the day long since passed for chronicling a big snake fight in the vicinity of the Central City, but such it appears is not the case, from a scene which recently transpired within a short drive of the Court House. Some of the older residents will remember a building which formerly stood on Prospect Hill, about six miles distant from Peoria, and which was destroyed some seven or eight years since. During the past season another house was erected near the same location, and all that has remained as relics of the old hotel, was a partially filled excavation for a cellar, and two well preserved brick cisterns, which had been kept covered up. Last week, the proprietor of the place, while busy with his wife in preparing their summer garden, found himself in want of a few bricks for the edge of the walks. Remembering the cisterns, he uncovered one of them, and finding it dry at the bottom, and only about six feet in depth, he jumped in, and commenced throwing out some of the best bricks he could pick from the walls. It seems, there was a piece of plank with one end partially imbeded in the earth that somewhat incommoded him so seizing it, with some exertion, pulled it out and threw it to the top. What was his horror and surprise, at the next moment, to find that he had unearthed an enormous rattle snake, and himself without a weapon in his hand.

As the cistern was round, and only about five feet in diameter, he could not jump out, and the snake bristling with anger and rattling defiance, was ready for battle.—His screams brought his wife to the scene, but she was so overcome with fright that she became powerless to render any assistance. The snake, in the meantime, had commenced the fight, making repeated springs at him, but fortunately he managed on each occasion to bit him upon the head with his boot, without receiving a bite, the snake all the time becoming more defiant and enraged. During the whole scene, which lasted several minutes, the man did not lose his presence of mind, but, watching his chance, made several frantic efforts to jump bodily from this seemingly pit of destruction. At the last trial, he fortunately grasped a brick, which gave way with him and remained in his hand, as he again stood fronting his hissing enemy.

After a few more kicks, and watching his opportunity, he fired it, making probably one of the best shots on record, for it struck the snake upon the head, and between the one sent and the wall, he became a "pretty well used up sarpint." Weak and exhausted, our hero, by the assistance of his wife was enabled to climb from the pit, but when once more upon the earth, he fainted away, and it was some time before he recovered. For several succeeding days he was quite unwell, owing probably to the poisonous effluvia inhaled, while his desperate exercise in the encounter rendered him exceedingly lame. The snake was afterwards taken from the cistern, when it was found to measure seven feet in length, and contained thirteen rattles! The latter have been preserved, and are placed in Shoaff's Museum for exhibition.—Peoria Transcripts.

Sporting Scenes in Canada.

WILD TURKEYS.

The wild turkey (Meleagris gallopavo, Linn.) from the woods of Canada. A few of these noble birds, however, are still to be met with in the extreme western districts, where they were very plentiful a few weeks since. Their extinction will be hastened by the reckless manner in which they are destroyed by trapping—a wholesale slaughter adopted by the thoughtless and avaricious "bush-whackers." The trap consists simply of a small log shanty, with a gridiron roof, and a very low door, to enter which the bird must stoop. The trapper takes a sheaf of wheat under his arm, traverses the woods in a line across which the turkeys are likely to run, and, scattering the straws along his track, makes his way to the trap, in which he deposits the remainder of the sheaf. On visiting the trap in a day or two he probably finds it full of turkeys. The writer knows of an instance in which nineteen were thus taken at one time. It appears that the bird, which is a stupid one at best, on finding its half caged, endeavours to escape by flying up against the roof, never thinking of using the door as an egress. It is a point of honor with the trappers not to marred or disturb each others traps. It is equally a point of honor with the sportsmen to destroy them, whenever he comes across them.—The most legimate and sportsmanlike mode of pursuing these birds is by stalking or "still-hunting" them in the snow. The hunter is attired in a white blanket coat, having a white handkerchief tied over his cap, so as not to attract the eyes of the wobsters as he glides like a shadow from tree to tree, following the tracts with silent moccasin-sheathed feet, until he arrives within favourable distance for a shot. He pauses before he pints off the old 'gobbler,' or leader of the flock, for a chance of getting one of them in a line. His weapon is a rifle, with a slender stock deeply crooked to fit the shoulder, and a long heavy barrel with a very small bore, giving it the appearance of a drilled crowbar.

SOUND-SHOOTING.

The summer deer is still very plentiful in many parts of Western Canada. There are several modes of hunting it—one being what is called "driving;" that is laying hounds on the track and chasing the deer through known runways in the woods, at intervals along which the hunters are posted, waiting till the chance of a shot turns up. The weapon for this kind of work is a heavy double gun, carrying a charge of ten of twelve grains of buckshot. But the keen sportsmen prefers the more independent, if less certain, sport of stalking the deer. In Canada it is called "still-hunting." November is a good time for this sport—the trees being then bare, and the woods well bedded down with the dead, wet leaves, on which the deer leaves sufficient tracks to guide the hunter to his retreat. But this tracking on the leaves required great experience, if not instinct; and it is better for the amateur to defer operations until the ground is covered with the first light snow. Dressed in a color to match the trees or the snow, as the case may be, the hunter steals up to his game by a process of stalking from tree to tree, which, to be successfully carried out, requires the greatest vigilance, caution, and, in fact, all the requisites nearly that are conditional to success in any kind of hunting. The rifle is the only weapon for the still-hunter; but with it even a practised shot will sometimes miss his deer, the animal generally presenting a very small mark, owing to being covered to a great extent by the holes and branches of the trees. One great charm in this sport is the intense solitude of the grand old woods, the stillness of which in winter is rarely broken, except by the goblin laugh of the great black woodpecker, or by the crackling of the trees when the frost is intense. These explosions are as loud as pistol shots; and hence it is that the deer becoming accustomed to the sound, are not startled by the crack of a rifle. The writer has fired at and missed his deer twice, the animal continuing to browse quietly while the operation of reloading was silently going on behind the far-off trees. The slightest noise produced by a tread or by the breaking of a twig, would have sent the animal bounding away into the midst of the forest.

ROUND THE TRAPS.

It is no bad sport to start off with a trapper on a fine frosty November morning upon a tour of inspection of his traps. In a commercial sense the marten is perhaps the most valuable of the animals thus sought after; but in trapping for him a great variety of others of the furry tribes fall into the snare. The writer on one occasion, went the rounds with an old trapper who lived in a sort of wigwam, or hovel, on the edge of a cedar swamp, miles away from anything approaching to civilization. The morning was sharp when we started, yet the wore nothing except a course flannel shirt, and trousers of the same, the latter being stuffed into great cowhide boots, the soles and uppers of which were fastened together with wooded pegs. Hat or cap he had no occasion for, his thick bush of grizzled and tangled hair, placing him far above the necessity for such conventional barbarisms. Accompanied by a nondescript foxy-looking cur, and armed with the everlasting rifle, he led the way by tokens best known to himself to the beginning of his "road of traps," as he called it. The trap used is the common snap-trap, or gin; set in a peculiar manner, however. The trapper bends down a stiff sapling, fastening it slightly to the ground by means of a notched peg. To the top of the sapling he affixes the trap with a thong, sets it, and having covered it slightly with leaves, scatters some offal of venison or any kind of meat about it, but not on the trap. The marten or corner of whatsoever kind, in tugging about at the bait, inevitably springs the trap, and at the first pull, slipping the sapling away from the peg, up he goes into the air, where he is played as an angler plays a fish. The object of this is to prevent him from having a "purchase" by which to extricate himself. In the first trap we came to there was an animal known to the hunters as a fisher (lucus a non lucendo,) for he catches no fish, but depredates in the tree-tops and thickets like the rest of the marten tribe, of which, although the largest, he is the least valuable. A blow on the head from the tough hickory, wiping-stick, or "service rod" settled his business, and on we went. In the next trap which had not been hitched down to a sapling, but was simply bound to a root, we found the forepaw of a marten; and in most of the others amounting perhaps to a dozen, there were martens, fishers, or minks—the latter which is a sort of water-marten or diminutive otter, with a very good dark brown fur. This mode of trapping was afterwards successfully tried by the writer.

The wiping-rod carried by the woodman is invariably used by them not only for cleaning, but for loading their rifles, for which purpose they seldom draw the ramrod.

SALMON-FISHING.

To the hardy salmon-fisher—one who is content to rough it in wigwam or tent, to brave the desagrémens incidental to a camp life, and to set aside for awhile the arbitrary refinements of what we must, with the best grace we can, accept for civilization—Canada offers great inducements, perhaps than any other of the countries to which the sportsman stated with the monotony of preserved fishings is accustomed to retire, in the hope of their falling upon the good, old-fashioned before the waters were made turbid by the wheels of the great water chariots, and ere yet the pipe of the locomotive had whistled the birds off the benches.

Down to the lower rivers you must go, if you seek for solitude and sphon. Of these tributaries to the St. Lawrence there are many, the best of from about one hundred and thirty to five hundred miles east of Quebec, and chiefly from the mountainous region which lies upon its northern shore.—I have most familiar to the determined angler are the Saguenay, mighty river in itself, with many a tributary of its own—the, the Godbout, the Moisie, and the Manicouagan. The country through which these rivers run is in general in the possession of the Hudson's Bay Fur Company, who in addition to a monopoly of peltries which the rapids and falls of the north supply them, derive no inconsiderable profits from their nets at the mouths of these rivers. Each of these netting-places is presided over by a maitre du peche. They do not sell the salmon by weight, but average the price by reckoning it to a standard of one dollar for each and every fish.

No exact standard can be formed as to the style of fly most to be depended on in these waters. I have found a claret body with grouse's wing good when the fish are disposed to take it—a general remark, which will apply equally well to a hackle with golden pheasant wing as to most other well-constructed flies. Your tackle must be of extra strength, for in most of the rivers of this country "snags" and such little impediments are to be encountered.

At the mouths of all these rivers excellent sport is to be had with the sea-trout, which greedily takes the fly. A redcock's hackle or palme-fly, with a peacock body, will do as well as any other. Fish with one fly, as, if you use droppers, you may be embarrassed by having more than one fish on at a time.—Leslies Newspaper.

IMMIGRATION.

From the Transcript.

While the New York papers are announcing with much satisfaction that the immigration from Europe to the United States this year is immense, we have a very contrary state of things to contemplate, the amount of immigration to Canada this season, at least by the St. Lawrence, being unprecedentedly small. The gain to the population of Canada by immigration in 1857, was 31,423; in 1858, it was 14,065. This year it gives promise of being still less; for whereas the number of immigrants who arrived at the port of Quebec in the season of 1858, up to the 18th May was 2,418, the number to the same date this year was 1,328, little over one-half.—A New York paper chronicles the arrival at that port of 3,717 immigrants from Europe in a single day, or nearly three times the number arrived at Quebec since the opening of navigation! The New York Times says that if a newly imported African, a barbarous savage, be worth $500 to a planter, each of these intelligent mechanics, laborers, farmers, &c., from Europe ought to be worth to the country at least double that sum. It claims, therefore that the arrivals of the single day in question were in fact an addition of $3,717,000 to the national wealth of the United States.

We presume the muscle and strength and brain and intellect of a European laborer, mechanic or farmer, would be of as much value to Canada, if brought here, as they are to the United States, when imported there. There are some classes of immigrants whom we find coming to Canada who as a general rule, benefit neither themselves nor this Province by coming to it. Young men able to write a good hand, possessing a knowledge of accounts, and otherwise tolerably educated, come out expecting employment as clerks, book-keepers, salesmen, &c.; and in five cases out of six the market in that department of labour being already overstocked they are wretchedly disappointed, and find that they committed a grievous mistake in embarking for Canada. There is a danger, too owing to the fluctuations of business, of particular classes of mechanical trades being at times overcrowded, and no mechanic ought to come to Canada, without having in the first place satisfied himself that a demand existed for that special kind of skilled labour which he is able to furnish. But, with these exceptions, Canada undoubtedly at all times presents a favorable field for judicious immigration. We have vast tracts of fertile land to be brought under cultivation, and we want men to accomplish the work, enriching the Province and enriching themselves in the Process. Millions may yet be added to the population of Canada without exhausting its resources.

It is evident, however, that for some reason Canada is falling into disrepute as a field for emigration. The figures given above prove this too plainly, and it is worthy of the best attention of our public men, how it can be made to regain the ground it has lost in the estimation of the moving classes in the old world, who meditate pushing their fortunes in transatlantic regions. Mr. McGee, one of the representatives of this city in the Provincial Legislature, deserves credit for having in each of the past two sessions brought this most important subject under the notice of Parliament. Last session, towards its close, he succeeded in obtaining a Committee of Enquiry, but owing to the lateness of the period at which they commenced their labors, they only sat for a few days examining no more than three or four witnesses. They reported, however the evidence they had taken, accompanied by some useful suggestions. They call attention to the fact, that for the last three years arrivals by the Suspension Bridge have been steadily gaining in excess of the arrivals at Quebec. This fact of the greater use of an indirect and in many respects unsafe route, over a direct, natural, and well-protected line of travel, they consider can be at least partially accounted for by the greater activity and success of the American shipping agents in European countries over those employed by Canadian shippers. The circumstance of the Consular establishments of the United States in European countries being made to serve the purposes of Emigration agencies, is also mentioned as accounting for the disproportionate amount of emigration to the States, as compared with Canada, which is entirely destitute of any agency of the kind. The Committee indicate their opinion that this should be as speedily as possible, and they suggest that in the meantime an emigrant map of Canada showing the settled, partially settled, or wholly unsettled portions of the country, should be at once prepared under the supervision of the proper department, and some arrangements made to insure its being generally circulated throughout the British Islands, Germany and the northern countries of Europe.

It will probably be seen that the present system which constitutes the duties of our public lands employees doubtful, and that we may be able to refer to the British Islands, Germany and the northern countries of Europe.

How we Exhaust Life.

If a railroad or steamboat disaster causes the slaughter of a score or two of people, we fall into spasms of indignation, and threaten all sorts of frightful visitations on the reckless offenders. But it generally turns out that the preservation of life is, with us more of a passion than a principle. The violent ebullition of feeling works itself off; culprits go unpunished; and the fearful evil reserves itself for another occasion of wholesale murder. These accidents show something more than bad official management. If they often implicate captains, conductors and companies as insensible to their responsibilities, they also evince a similar insensibility on the part of the public to the sacredness of human life. The fact is that we hold life as a cheap thing. Shrewd as we are at other bargains, we rarely put life into one scale and "value received" into the other; but we trade, speculate, and gamble the chances of existence as if it were quite a trifle whether we lost or won.

There are times and circumstances when men, in obedience to some lofty principle or noble impulse, may generously offer up their life on the alter of patriotism or philanthropy. But the worth of such an offering mainly consists in the value attached to what they sacrifice, and it is surrendered only because a higher duty than self-preservation controls them. The ordinary instinct of our nature in relation to life is intensely strong, and, if rightly disciplined, will impart its virtue to our estimate of every thing connected with its care and protection. For this mighty instinct is not within us for seasons of danger alone, but should attend us at each moment as the sovereign over every habit, pursuit and inclination.

One of the most persicious of our evils is the excessive facility with which we exhaust life. There is no end to our ingenuity in devising plans to wear it out. We treat life as a thing to be tortured. Moloch and Juggernauts supply fiery arms and ponderous wheels to consume and crush it. We eat up life; we drink it; we roast and fry it; we burn it in furnaces; we blow it away in vociferous talking; we rattle it to pieces over rough streets, and turn it into steam to rush along highways. Our muscles have as much put on them as if they were tougher than buffalo hides, and our nerves are charged with electricity enough to report the news of a continent through the cable of an Atlantic telegraph. Nature made the heart a quiet force-pump, and we use it as a furious fire-engine. Men hurry past us in the street, and we hear their palpitations as though the emergency of life were on them. We beat ostriches and alligators in diet. Their skill in managing oyster-shell and pine-knot is fairly outwitted. Our modes of living render summer hotter and winter colder. Diseases dependent on a disregard of the laws of temperature and diet multiply doctors by thousands annually, and paupers transcend all statistics. A man without dyspepsia, and a woman exempt from neuralgia, would surpass any museum of small wonders.—Then to our cares and excitements. We will not have repose. It is banished from the fireside, from the pillow, and from the Sabbath; and these three great energies of calm and refreshing beauty have the heart of Heaven torn out of them. There is but one symbol of repose in our midst, and that is the grave. And what a landscape of their own these graves make! Life and death must always appear in strong contrast. The homes of the dead, scarcely rising above the earth, must be far more emblematic of lowliness and rest than the towering structures of the worldly ambitious; but why should the graves of our country be such a rebuke to our stormy, rushing life? Why, when all their associations should be so tranquillising, should American burial-places be mainly suggestive of images and thoughts that so pointedly remind us of folly and sin in our modes of living?

The impetuous haste with which we live is one of the marked facts of the day. We are in an everlasting hurry to be or to do something. If our young men go to college they quit study about the time they are fit to begin. The necessary result is that our system of education opens for short of effecting their ends; and in no country under heaven, considering the machinery employed, is there so much desultory development. There is no continuity of habit; indeed habit, in our land, so far from growing into a man, and fitting him all over like his skin is a mere outside garment, changed at will. Decade succession is even worse. We make new schemes and pursue courses by superintending their installment; persuade ourselves that it would take 5 years Methuselah's life-time to accomplish; and then [illegible] into life with a taste of reality [illegible] the dynamite dentist and the [illegible] dancer. The same gas [illegible] now the bridges.

time. To-day and to-morrow are all that are known on change and in the counting-room. Our young people talk of age with disgust, and thus betray the deep-rooted aversion, amounting almost to an American characteristic, to growing old. If a fortune of a million were offered to nine-tenths of our people on condition that they should regularly and persistently labor until sixty years of age, they would reject it as supremely ridiculous. What would be the use of it then? Splendid houses, costly equipages, great chances, and fashionable soirees would have no mastering power over the precious eyes of other persons; and unless they could be vanquished the whole affair would be voted a dead failure. But a still worse feature of this vice of haste is in over-indulgence in pleasure early in life. Talk as we may of the rapid growth of our people in their morbid passion for money, our young population have taken this fast age, in all its length and breadth, into their capacious receptacle of pleasure. They must circumnavigate the social world in their gay pinnaces—streamers flying and music playing—before they are twenty-five. Now this irrational method of living is bad enough in view of health, influence and usefulness; but it is beyond redemption to happiness itself. If men and women intend to lead an animal life, or a life one remove above it—if they do aim to a philosophize sensualism into a creed and refine it into an elegant art—pray let them have brute sense enough to wait for the mature development of animal tastes and sensibilities.

What Italy has given to the World,

M. Legouve, of the French Academy, has written a letter to the Siecle recommending a subscription to be raised for the purpose of enabling Italians in Paris to proceed to the seat of war and take part in the military operations. After dwelling on the advantage of that course, the writer says: "I will leave antiquity out of the question, and speak only of modern times. It is not a striking spectacle to see Italy always give the signal to the world, always open the way for great things? The first modern epic poet is an Italian—Dante; the first lyric poet is an Italian—Petrarch; the first port of chivalry is an Italian—Ariosto; the first modern novelist is an Italian—Boccacio; the first painter in the world is an Italian—Raphael; the first statuary is an Italian—Michael Angelo; the first vigorous statesman and historian of the revival is an Italian—Machiavelli; the first philosophical historian is and Italian—Vico; the discoverer of the New World is an Italian—Christopher Columbus; and the first demonstrator of the laws of the heavens world is an Italian—Galileo. You will find a son of Italy standing on every step of the temple of genius, ever since the twelfth century. Even in this time nearer to our own, while all other nations are working at the continuation of this immortal gallery Italy from time to time collects her strength and presents to the world a colossus surpassing all. Now, even now, the greatest of living artists, the only one perhaps who deserves, solely as an artist, the title of a great man, is he not an Italian—Rossini? and lastly, was he not also a son of Italy, that giant who toured above the whole century, and covered all around him with his light or his shade—Napoleon? In fact it would seem that when Providence wants a guide or a leader for humanity it strikes this favored soil, and a great man springs forth."

A Chinese Gentleman's House.

He first took us to his country house, which was now uninhabited. It was the perfect residence of a Chinese gentleman. There was a very large garden, with bamboo hedges and large fish tanks, edged with walls of blue bricks and perforated tiles. His pigs were in admirable condition, and as beautifully kept as the Prince Consort's at Windsor. About the grounds were nutmegs, mangosteens, plantains, cocoa nuts, durians, and small creepers trained into baskets and pagodas. Inside the houses the drawing rooms had doors sliding across circular openings. We then went on to the good gentleman's private residence, entering by a Chinese triumphal gate. He tells me he has ten miles of carriage road round his estate. It is on a fine, undulating tract of land, reclaimed from the jungle, and laid out with rare taste. In the outskirts a tiger killed a man the other day.—In his garden I found Jacko, living in a cane cage, next door to a porcupine; there were also some rare birds. Further on some very small Brahmin bulls, a Cashmere goat, and a family of young kangaroos.—There were all sorts of unknown beautiful flowers placed in enormous China vases.—Here I first saw the tea plant growing.—It is of the camellia tribe, three or four feet high perhaps, and bears a small white color, like the open dog rose; also I was shown the "moon flower," a kind of rounded convolvulus, that only opens at night. There was a bower of "monkey cups"—the pitcher flower, which collects water, and from which Jacko refreshes himself in the jungles. The fan palm—a beautiful tree on the lawn—produced water of clear, cold quality by being pierced with a pocket-knife. Several minute creepers were trained over wire forms, to imitate dragons, with eggshells for their eyes; and there were many of the celebrated dwarf-trees—the first I had ever seen—little oaks and elms about 18 inches high, like small withered old men. The house here was superbly furnished in the English style, but with lanterns all about it. At six o'clock the guests arrived—mostly English—all dressed in short white jackets and trousers. The dinner was admirably served in good London style, and all the appointments, as regarded plate, glass, wines, and dishes, perfect. The quiet attentive waiting of the little China boys deserved all praise. After dinner we lounged through the tastefully-furnished English prints of the Royal Family, statuettes in bronze from every part of the world, and rare objects in furniture and ornament from China and Japan, and ended with a cup of coffee, and a cigar in the verandah, where I found [illegible] Chinese [illegible] and [illegible]

The Armstrong Gun.

(Extract from Speech of Mr. W. G. Armstrong.)

The projectiles, which are in all cases made of cast iron, thinly coated with lead, and being of somewhat larger diameter than the bore of of the gun, the lead is crushed into the rifle grooves, by means of which the necessary rotation is given, while all shake or windage are prevented. The projectile for field service admits of being used as solid shot, shell, or common case. It is composed of separate pieces, so completely bound together that it has been fired through a mass of oak timber nine feet in thickness without sustaining fracture.—When used as a shell it divides into 60 regular pieces, and 100 irregular pieces. It combines the principle of the shrapnel and percussion shell,—i. e., it may be made to explode either as it approaches the object or as it strikes it. Among friends it is no safe that it may be thrown off the top of a house without exploding but among enemies is so sensitive and mischievous that it bursts with a touch. The reason is that the shock it receives in the gun puts the percussion arrangement, as it were, from half cock to full cock, and it then becomes so delicate that it will burst by striking a bag of shavings, as has been proved at Shoeburyness. Moreover it may be made to explode at the instant of leaving the gun, in which case the pieces spread out like a fan, and produce the usual effect of grape or canister. In short, it may be made to explode either at very long or very short distances, and either by impact or by the action of the time fuse, and wherever it bursts it operates like grape shot.—With respect to the precision and range which have been attained with these guns, I have little to add to what General Peel has stated, but I may observe that since his statements were made very improved results have been obtained. At a distance of 600 yards an object no larger than the muzzle of an enemy's gun may be struck at almost every shot. At 3,000 yards a target of nine feet square which at that distance looks like a mere speck, has on a calm day been struck 5 times in 10 shots. A Ship would afford a target large enough to be hit at much longer distances. It will be necessary that gunners should undergo a more refined and scientific training than at present; and I trust and believe that both the naval and military departments of Government will take the necessary measures to afford the proper instruction both to officers and men. It is an interesting question to consider what would be the effect of the general introduction of these weapons upon the various conditions of warfare. In the case of ships opposed to ships in the open sea, it appears to me they would simply destroy each other like cats if both were made of timber. The day has gone by for putting men in armour, but I suspect it is only approaching for putting ships in armour. Fortunately no nation can play at the game like England; for we have boundless resources both in the production and application of iron, which must be the material for the armour. In the case of a battery against a ship the advantages would be greatly in favor of the battery, because it would have a steady platform for its guns, and it is made of a less vulnerable material, suppose the ship to be made of timber. But on the other hand in bombarding fortresses, arsenals, or dockyards, when the object to be struck is very extended, ships would be enabled to operate at a great distance, where they could bid defiance to land defences. In the case of invasion, which is, perhaps, the most interesting case to consider, the possession of such an artillery would be all-important to the defenders. It would probably be impossible to effect a landing if opposed even by field batteries of such guns; and if a landing were effected, the retreating force would generally be enabled to avail itself of cover while the attacking party would have to advance on the open, where they would be awfully cut up.

Kansas Gold Humbug.

SUFFERING AND STARVATION ON THE PLAINS.

We have already published a brief telegram relative to the suffering and starvation of the Pike's Peak emigrants on the Plains. The following correspondence of a St. Louis paper, from Denver City, gives fuller particulars:

Saturday evening last, 7th instant, the first and long-looked-for mail and passenger stage of the Leavenworth and Pike's Peak Stage Company arrived here. It was out twenty days from Leavenworth, but now that the way stations are formed, and bridges made, it is thought fourteen or fifteen days will suffice to make the trip. The new route thus laid out, via Republican Fork of Kansas River, seems to be a good one, according to the report of the Stage Company, though about the same length as the old Fort Kearney and Arkansas routes, hilly and sandy on this end and destitute of timber for fuel for an equal distance with the others, or some 100 or 160 miles.

We have had sickening rumors for a week past of horrible suffering from freezing, starvation, and robbery of emigrants by way of the Smoky Hill route. Several intelligent gentlemen who had arrived by that route, told me they were themselves so long on the way—over sand and hills, and without a road at all, that they were reduced almost to starvation—lived ten or fourteen days upon prickly pears and such few wild onions and other edibles as they could pick up, and also that they helped to bury several persons who died from starvation. The agent of the stage company brought us in word that he picked up a starving man some fifty miles from here, who had come across from the Smoky Hill route; that when found he was in a most wretched condition. His name is Bliss, and he is from Whiteside County, Illinois. There were three brothers of them—first, one died, and the two ate from his body, after they had been rendered senseless by emaciation. The second brother died and was nearly eaten up by the survivor. The stage agent went out and buried the remains of the youngest of the brothers, but could not find the remains of the first who died. A man named Gibbs was the leader of the starved company. Gibbs got in nearly starved, and supposes the rest, some nine in all, perished. The survivor was left at one of the mail stations, and the report is confirmed by the stage passengers. Others report large number of graves on the route, and that many once have perished and much property been abandoned on the way. I saw one party which had thrown out a train of sixteen wagons.

By receipt of papers I perceive that the the fate of emigrants had created a very great. The number of arrivals here to-day is said for the past few days about one hundred which seems to me to be equally startling in the population of Denver. Nearly every one of them are returning to the States, and many of them are destitute of the means of getting back. Many who have been here all winter, and have claims, are also returning, disheartened at the prospect. Many of the merchants here have also closed out their business, and are returning to the States. Provisions are very high here, and will be higher. Flour is now selling at $12 per hundred pounds, and corn at $3 per bushel. Hay is also very high. Common cabins are rented at $30 per month. Common laborers are getting $3 per day, and mechanics $5 per day. Common lots in town are selling at $100 each. It is estimated that 2,200 persons have left here for home in the last twenty days.—This is an addition to those who turned back before reaching here, induced by the intelligence received from others on their return. Probably as many more reached here in that time; but I think there are no more people in the whole mining country to-day. The towns (or villages which they all are, and small ones too), seem quite deserted by whites, and as many Indians as pale faces are now in and about this village. Yesterday a dozen or more Indian braves, of Arrapahoe tribe, rode in, accompanied by the head chief, Raven, and two of his brothers. They collected at the office of Judge Smith, to hold a talk with the whites, relative to an arrangement with the Government for a sale of their territory, and some aid to their nation to become an agricultural and a civilized one. They are already about as civil as the whites here, and far more temperate; indeed I have not seen an intoxicated Indian in the mining region. The interpreter, Antoine Du Bray, was drunk at the meeting, and falling off his seat as he sat down by the intelligent-looking and dignified Quaker-like chief, Raven, rendered any attempt at a pow-wow a farce; and it was immediately adjourned for a day until the interpreter should become sober.

As for the gold news, or reports from the mines, nothing reliable is heard; many rumors of paying diggings are afloat, but they are received with much doubt.

The Execution this Morning.

We have received a telegram stating that Dr. King was executed this morning at 15 minutes past 8 o'clock. No further particulars. We will publish a full account next week.

The Progress of the War.

From the news brought by the steamship Washington, we have tidings that the first battle has been fought. The scene of the conflict was Montebello, and the battle is reported to have lasted four hours, resulting in the defeat of the Austrians with a loss of 2,000 killed, and 200 taken prisoners. The French loss is supposed to have been from 500 to 600. As far as can be learned from the despatches on both sides it would appear that the Austrians are gradually falling back upon Lombardy, and that the French and Sardinians are following in their footsteps, as I are now on the line of the Sesia upon which Vercelli is situated.

The war news for some time to come will in all probability be of great importance, and in order that our readers may be able to follow the movements of the combatants in the struggle, we propose to furnish gratis, as a supplement to our next issue, a large-sized

MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR.

Single copies of the Examiner with the supplement, may be had at the office of publication, or at T. Menzies' book and news Depot, on Thursday morning next.

Political Prospects.

The Ministerial prints at present seem to be at sixs' and sevens' amongst themselves, and each of the charlatan's has his own nostrum to cure the body politic of our sadly mis-governed country. The majority of Upper Canadian journals in the government interest seem to have discovered since the close of last session of Parliament, that matters might have been better conducted than they have been—that it would have been full as well, if the section of the United Provinces had some voice in the enactment of laws for themselves—that it is not altogether congenial to the British born in this Province and their decendants to be entirely at the mercy of the descendants of old France. Such admissions are now generally acceded to by the most bigotted admirers of our present corrupt system. But how is the change to be brought about? The journals in question, with the Toronto Leader at their head, have been beating the bush these last three weeks, to see if it was not possible to enlist some fagend of the reforms of Up per Canada into the Ministerial ranks; but it seems that efforts in that direction have failed, otherwise however trival the success, we should have heard it in loud tones echoed through the Ministerial organs of both Provinces. Can any sapient philosopher devine what is our future prospects? "Get rid of that intolerable George Brown" says some consequential gent, with eye glass stuck to his optics, "and matters will go on to the satisfaction of the United Provinces in future." "Dissolve the Union," responds the sturdy grumpy; that at present seems to be our only salvation. "Give us Representation by Population" demands the merchant and mechanic, "and then at least we will have fair play, and equal rights as to number." Either of the latter two alternatives, sooner or later, if matters don't mend, will follow as a matter of course, and do to the former entirely—the getting rid of Mr. Brown, we say perfectly satisfied, that he will never prove a stumbling-block in the way of this Province claiming her just rights as set forth in the resolutions of [illegible] Parliament, which the most [illegible] of Upper Canada [illegible]

These as loyal subjects we may appear ungrateful in making the assertion, towards a gentleman who by tongue and pen has unflinchingly advocated our interests, both in Parliament and out of it; but the truth is, we are tired—sick tired of the eternal twaddle, the Ministerial prints invent in reference to the Reformers of Canada generally and the senior member for Toronto in particular. We are perfectly satisfied, that another session of Parliament will work a radical change in our political system of corruption as presently administered, we can therefore afford to "bide our time" suggesting the hint—

Be Britons still to Britons true,
Among ourselves united,
And never but by Britons hands,
Shall Briton's wrongs be righted.

JUNE FAIR—There was an unusually large attendance on Tuesday. Business transactions however were limited, owing no doubt to the scarcity of the "one thing needful."

CELTIC GAMES—A meeting of Scotchmen and others favorable to the organization of a Celtic Game Club, in Peterboro', will be held in the Temperance House, Water street, on Saturday evening next, at 8 o'clock.

THE WEATHER—The cold snap of last Saturday evening proved very destructive to the gardens. We hear of no injury to the grain crops, however, but on the contrary, reports from all quarters agree that the wheat crop never gave better promise of an abundant harvest.

A COMPLIMENT—The Scottish American Journal commenting on the effects of the new Canadian postage law, remarks:—"The author of the new Postage regulations bears the honored name of Sydney Smith. Why Sydney we are not aware, but we presume the name was bestowed in anticipation, and not because of the brilliant talents and intelligence of the Postmaster General."

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, June 6, 1859.

Council met. Present—his worship the Mayor, Messrs. Conger, Henthorn, White, Fowlis, Teole, Read, Bradfield, Eastland, Hogan and Burnham.

S. Dickson, presented an account for £14 1s. 7d., which was referred to Com. on Streets and Bridges.

A petition from James Wilson was read, praying for a part of his Saloon license, as he was prepared to give up his business, which was laid on the table.

S. Dickson and Harman presented a petition asking the Council to reduce the taxes of Child & Backus on the mill rented by them, from the rental to the value, which was referred to Com. on Finance and Assessments.

A report from the Finance Committee stating that having examined the financial state of the Town, they find that after very carefully going into the liabilities and credits of the Town, including the proposed improvements, the sum of £3,662 1s. 0d., will require to be raised, to meet the current expenses; recommending also to raise by way of loan through the medium of debentures the sum of £1,250 for the following purposes:—£825 for balance of Railroad stock, £275 for the purchase of land, and £250 for expenditure on streets and bridges, leaving £2,412 1s. 0d., to be raised by rate, to do which it will require 2s. 8d. in the £. The report was received and adopted.

A report from the Com. on Printing recommending dividing of the printing of the Council to the two offices in Town was received and adopted.

Mr. Conger moved that the Council go into Committee of the Whole on the second reading of By-law No. ——, a By-law to repeal By-law No. 101, after considerable discussion to motion was lost.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Fowlis—That the Market By-law be submitted to a Committee consisting of Messrs. Conger, Fowlis and the mover to consider such complaints that have arisen.—Carried.

Mr. White gave notice that at the next meeting of the Council he would move for the appropriation of a sum of money to assist in the construction of a bridge across the Otonabee river on the Boundary line between Smith and Monaghan, such appropriation not to exter into the expenses of this year.

Mr. Conger stated that as no time should be lost in preparing the By-law in order to issue the debentures as recommended in the report of the Finance Committee, he considered it necessary for the Council to meet early, so as to have the By-law published this week.

The Council then adjourned.

A Touching Incident.

NAPOLEON AND TIMOLEON DUROSIER.

Miss Pardoe, in a recent work, relates the following interesting anecdote:—"At the battle of Montmirail, a young officer named Durosier chanced to be in attendance on the Emperor at the moment when it became essential to despatch an order to one of the Generals of Division; and Napoleon, hastily summoning him to his side, gave him instructions to deliver it without delay. 'Spare neither yourself nor your horse, sir,' he said sternly, 'for there is not a moment to lose; and return at once to report to me that my order has been obeyed.' Durosier galloped off amid a shower of shots and shells; and within a quarter of an hour he was again beside the Emperor. His duty was performed. 'You have behaved well, monsieur,' said Napoleon, when he had received his report; 'You have a stout heart and clear head, though still a youngster. I give you a captain's brevet, and attach you to my person. What is your name?' 'Durosier, sire.' 'It seems familiar to me. On what occasion have I before heard it?' 'I was the Colonel of the boy battalion, your Majesty.'—'Ah! I remember. Well, that is an additional reason why I should attach you to my person.' 'It is too late, sire,' murmured the young soldier. 'Too late, captain Durosier—and why?' 'Sire, they have hit me;' and as he spoke he exhibited a handkerchief saturated with blood from the breast of his coat. 'All will soon be over—Vive la Empereur, Vive la France!' He reeled for a moment in his saddle, and then fell heavily into the arms of an officer who had sprung forward to support him. 'Timoleon Durosier was a soldier!'—'Oh young! the young!' said the Emperor, dismounting and bending tenderly over the dying youth. 'Timoleon Durosier was a soldier!' repeated the Emperor, as he remained for an instant over the body; 'Poor boy, poor boy! Napoleon and Timoleon Durosier—Timoleon Durosier and Napoleon—the latter will be the last name that will ever be heard on the field of battle.' And the Emperor remounted his horse, and rode on at the head of his troops."

NEWS BY THE HUNGARIAN.

THE AUSTRIANS IN ITALY.

Correspondence of the Times.

AUSTRIAN HEAD-QUARTERS,
Mortara, May 10.

Your correspondent at Vienna has probably kept you informed of those movements of this army which are of sufficient importance to be communicated by telegraph. I will, however, recapitulate briefly what has been done since the beginning, as telegraphic despatches are not famous for either extreme accuracy or even for consistency one with another.

The first Austrian troops crossed the Ticino on the 29th of April, five days after the French had passed the western frontier of Sardinia. This delay, as you know, was in deference to the wish of the British Cabinet.

A brigade of the 5th corps, under General Festitics, had the honor of leading the way. It crossed at Pavia, and pushed on the same day through Garlasco to the Terdoppio river, followed by the entire 3rd corps under Prince Schwarzenberg, to Gropello.

The 7th corps, under Baron Zobel, has come up from Bergamo and Brescia to Rho intending to cross the Ticino further north, made a demonstration at Buffalora, and then turned southward through Abbiate Grosso towards the bridge of Vigevano, which, however, it found blown up. It was therefore obliged to cross at Bereguardo on a pontoon bridge constructed by the engineers. This it did on the 29th, reaching Gambolo the same day.

On the following day (the 30th) the 5th Corps under Count Stadion, passed the same bridge and the 8th corps, under the renowned General Benedek, crossed the Pavia; the 7th pushing on to Mortara, and the 3rd to Garlasco.

On the 1st of May the 2nd corps under Prince Liechtenstein, crossed at Pavia, so that it took three days for the whole five corps d'armee to cross the Ticino.

On the night of the 1st of May the line extended along the Agogna river from Vespola on the north to San Nazarro, and thence to the eastward along the Po; the 3rd corps still keeping the centre, with the 5th and seventh on its right, and the eighth and second on the left. This relative position having been kept until now, I need not detail the daily marches, but will merely briefly say that the line was gradually advanced and extended in their order until the day before yesterday, the 8th when the head-quarters of the commander-in-chief, General Gyulai, were at Verrelli, and the whole country north of the Po as far as Biella and Cenglia on the north-west, was occupied by the Austrians almost without opposition. The Piedmontese dug trenches across and otherwise injured the roads, and placed batteries to defend them, but did not do so. At Verrelli they mined the magnificent railway bridge across the Sesia, but the Austrians discovered and withdrew the gunpowder. This non-resistance is very remarkable, for the nature of the country is such that the advance of an army can be most easily impeded. The roads are in most cases artificially raised, the fields on each side being dead flat and kept under water for the cultivation of rice, besides which numerous canals at several different levels cross each other in every conceivable way.

The chief opposition occurred at Valenza where there were two line bridges across the Po. The one the Piedmontese had themselves destroyed, and the other the Austrians determined to destroy for them; so on the 3rd and 4th they made great demonstrations as if to cross the river, both there and opposite Frassinetto, and succeeded in mining the bridge. On the 4th, also, General Benedek, the enemy's attention being drawn to the above-named points succeeded in crossing the Po at Cornale with 40,000 men, on a bridge constructed by the engineers—a corps which no Austria has reached a wonderful degree of efficiency. He pushed on to Voghera and reconnoitered Tortona with a powerful detachment. In retiring he blew up the railway bridge at Ponteurone, which must be a serious blow to the allies. On the night of the 4th to the 5th, the Po rose 15 feet, and destroyed General Benedek's Bridge over the Po, thus quite isolating him. In 24 hours however, another was constructed, over which he retired on the 6th, carrying off vast stores of bread, tobacco, salt, rice, meal, corn, hay, &c., from Voghera.

At Valenza the unparalleled rise of the Po filled the first mines formed, and it was not till the 8th of May that the bridge was finally destroyed. At Frassinetto, the intended deception was completely successful. Quantities of boards, &c., were ordered with great ostentation at Candia, and some hundreds of laborers. On the 3rd of May some Lancers led the way across a ford of the Sesia to an Island between that river and the Po. Four companies of grenadiers followed, and half a rocket battery, the whole under Col. Puchner. The island is thickly covered with brushwood, so the smallness of their number was concealed from the enemy, who opened a heavy fire from the southern bank of the Po. This was answered by the rocket battery and the Grenadiers, who entrenched themselves along the banks. As the Piedmontese fancy they did much mischief that day, a few accurate figures may be useful. The Austrians lost on the 3rd, before midnight, one man killed and eight wounded; of the latter, one has since died. At night Captain Dwyer, an Irishman, led over another battalion to the island, and a noise of hammering was kept up till morning, as if bridges for the passage of a large army were being constructed. During the entire night the loss to the Austrians was only three men wounded. Here, too, the rapid rise of the Sesia which took place a few hours before that of the Po, nearly caused a loss, but happily the whole force was withdrawn in safety, owing to the voluntary exertions of the Piedmontese laborers who saved many drowning men. This circumstance clearly proves how untrue are the statements made about the animosity of the Italians against the Austrians. I have myself on this occasion been only three days in Piedmont, but I have already ridden 140 miles, and stopped at nearly every village, and to an Englishman the natives would not conceal their feelings. I can assure you that their anger is all against their own Government, not for this war merely, but for the whole policy of overloading them with taxes, such as our exploded window tax and the tax on carriages, for the purpose of keeping up an army beyond the means of the country. I speak of the peasantry, the burgers and lawyers think differently.

Yesterday most of the troops were withdrawn to the east of the Sesia, and the head-quarters moved to Mortara this evening. Not knowing that I rode to Vercelli and had testimony. The Piedmontese re-occupied Vercelli in the afternoon, and [illegible] Vercelli [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] be encouraged to feel that they are Britons. Of course we advocate no invasion of their local rights and institutions. The union must be of the nature of a federal one. But it should exist in reality and on some sort of equal footing. The sentiment of a British subject ought to be superior to that of the mere Colonist, as the feeling of an American citizen is to that of a mere citizen of an American State. But at present the Colonists are becoming more Colonists and less British subjects, and this is because they are not practically recognized and treated in a manner fitted to call forth the higher form of allegiance. They must be embraced in the sympathies of the British people on equal terms, and recognized, as they are certainly most willing to be, as in the fullest sense British citizens.—Scottish American Journal.

Mr. Disraeli on the War.

Among those who have unbosomed themselves to their constituencies on this occasion not the least note-worthy is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Disraeli. His position makes his words perhaps more generally interesting than those of any member of the House of Commons, and he assured his Buckingham auditory, on Monday, that he spoke without reserve. There was perhaps more pretence made by him about speaking the truth, and withholding none of it, than most people who are in the practice of speaking the truth consider necessary; but the Chancellor, no doubt, well knew that truth, and especially the whole truth, seldom expected from a statesman in power. There was also a good deal of blarney to the working-classes about their industry, intelligence, and moral and social virtues, which, coming from one who thinks that there is no intelligence for voting under a £10 rent, must be regarded as but "indifferent honest." Allowances are to be made at election times. But we have no reason to question the honesty of the facts which the honourable gentleman made known with regard to the war, and some of these were of no small importance to the nation at the present time For instance, the alliance between France and Russia, which the Times first announced, and so pertinaciously asserted and which caused so much anxiety in this country, received its quietus from Mr Disraeli. By his statement, the agreement between these Powers just amounts to about as much as that which existed between the Allied Powers and Austria during the late war with Russia. The fact of this arrangement was made known voluntarily to the British Government by the French Minister some time ago; but to set the matter at rest, they had made application to the Russian Government, and their denial of any other alliance was in the most explicit form. He stated, also, that the pretended alliance between France and Denmark was equally groundless, and so friendly was the latter Power that Britain could at any time calculate on its aid.—Such are the solemn assertions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there is no reason whatever that he should not be believed. There is no just ground for supposing that there is any design among the nations at present for making an attack upon the supremacy of Britain; but should any design exist, Mr Disraeli expressed his confidence in the military and pecuniary resources of this country as more than equal to her own defence. He spoke with contempt about the £40,000 000 about to be borrowed by the French, as it would scarcely suffice for a year, and could not often be repeated, whereas Britain could raise that sum every year by a light tax, which would not materially interfere with the ordinary resources of the country. He still further assured his constituents, and the world generally, that a great portion of the 100,000, which will make up the finest army the world ever saw, would soon be home from India, where they were no longer required; there were one hundred thousand well-disciplined troops at home; and in six weeks should have a powerful fleet in the Channel and in the Mediterranean—what nation in the world, then, asks Disraeli, can compete with England! We are, therefore, according to the injunctions of the honourable gentleman, not to be afraid of John Frenchman, nor for all Europe, nor to be anxious for the "balance of power," for we are still mighty. Our colonies are getting great and strong, and America herself, Britain's own lusty child, would not idly stand by when old John was being hardly pressed. We have, therefore, to look calmly on, while the two great Continental despots eat each other up, and Mr Disraeli, as well as Lord John Russell, thinks it won't take long. We must be ready to fight, in order to keep ourselves out of the scrape, and even in this respect we are in a pretty forward state. The [illegible] was certainly a very able one, [illegible] ready arranged, and every statement well weighed. It must also tend to relieve the nation of groundless apprehensions in reference to the position of parties, aims of the war, and the military and naval capabilities of this country. Some effect to treat Mr Disraeli's remarks about the Alliance as only hypercritical gammon, to deceive and blind; but we are certainly not come to that stage of the unveracities, when British Statesmen will come before the world and assert solemnly what they know to be false.

American Neutrality.

ENGLAND DEPENDING UPON AMERICA IN THE WAR CRISIS.

The certainty that a European war will interfere with the carrying trade, not only of all the Powers directly involved, but even of those which may be in danger of being drawn in, has caused inquiry to be directed to the possibility of registering European ships under the American flag.—The statute law of the United States is, in this respect, virtually prohibitive. No foreign ship can be registered unless a sum equal to two-thirds of her value shall have been expended upon her in repairs or improvements in America. Even an American vessel which has been lawfully condemned by a foreign Government, or sold to a foreigner, cannot upon being re-purchased by an American, receive except upon these conditions, a new register. It is also provident that foreign vessels which may have acquired the American flag shall lose the benefit of registration if their owners, being naturalized citizens, reside more than one year in the country of their origin, or two years in any other foreign country. Foreign steamers, if their owners are resident in the United States, may be enrolled for river service, on security being given that they shall not be employed on other waters; and this, apparently, is the sole opening allowed. Any relaxation of the law can be obtained only by a special act of Congress. There is, however a solution of the difficulty that would meet all general requirements. Although it may be difficult to procure an American register, a visitor can be placed under the American flag by a bill of sale drawn up by the American Consul in England, together with a certificate that she is owned by an American citizen. She will then [illegible] the proper [illegible] of the United States Government to every description of American property, remaining, with regard to tonnage dues and all similar conditions, under the liabilities common to any foreign vessel. That this plan would be extensively adopted in case of England becoming involved in war can scarcely be doubted, and it is probable, also, that increased latitude might be given by special acts to facilitate the granting even of a national registry.—The impolicy of the existing restrictions is as obvious as that of all other obstacles to the free interchange of commodities. On the breaking out of a war a neutral country could, of course purchase vessels from any of the belligerents on highly profitable terms. But if this is forbidden her traders are compelled to build new vessels, and always at an extravagant cost, owing to the general suddenness of demand. Meanwhile the ships which would have fully answered the purpose, and which might have been had at half the outlay, are lying without employment. But when the war is ended these are brought into competition with the expensive vessels built in the interval, and which are at once reduced to an almost nominal value, to the ruin of all who have invested in them. The prohibition, therefore, involves to the neutral country not merely a sheer loss of the difference between the price of home-built ships and that at which the foreign vessels could have been bought, but also of the amount of depreciation which is ultimately inflicted on both sets of vessels, through the freight-market being glutted with a needless quantity. The Protectionists will urge that there was a great advantage in the employment opened for home labor in the original construction of the new vessels, but this is a long-exploded fallacy. By employing labor in building vessels which might have been had more cheaply elsewhere, they have diverted it from other branches of employment which would have been equally profitable at the time, and which, being independent of any artificial impulse, would not have involved the penalty of an ultimate reaction.—Times.

CANADIAN NEWS.

John Mitchell, who murdered his wife Eliza Walsh, in Hamilton, last April, was executed on Tuesday morning last. He confessed his crime; and stated that his real name was John Meehan.

We have Colonel Prince's authority for stating that there is no truth whatever in the report that he has been appointed a Judge at Sault St. Mary, or at any other place.

THE VICTORIA BRIDGE.—The Gazette states that the work on the remaining piers of the Victoria Bridge is being impeded by the very high water in the river. It is feared that this will delay the completion of the work until so late in November as to render an inaugural celebration this autumn by no means desirable.

A SAD ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday, the 6th inst., George Jamison, of the township of Bagot, was drowned in the Madawaska river at Calabogie Rapids.

THE CROPS.—A gentleman who has travelled throughout this County (Grey) during the last few days reports that the crops generally look extremely well and promise an abundant harvest.—Owen Sound Comet.

The Queen's proclamation of neutrality in the approaching war has been published in the Canada Gazette. We trust that it will have its due effect on the Quebec Canadian, and that it will cease its efforts to create a diversion on behalf of Louis Napoleon.

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE OF DEATH.—His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to commute the sentence of death passed upon Louis Larue, at the Court of Queen's Bench, Kamouraska, into fourteen years imprisonment in the Provincial Penitentiary.

PRETTY GOOD.—The Free Press of London, C. W., states that buildings of brick and stone to the amount of $100,000 are in progress of erection in that city.—This speaks well for the Forest City, especially in view of the fact that she has lately declined in population.

NEWS BY THE "INDIAN"

QUEBEC, June 7, 9.30, p.m.—The Austrians have been in full retreat since last evening. The loss of the enemy exceeds 2,000 men.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times says that the Austrian force consisted of three brigades, and their loss was probably about the same as that of the French.

TURIN, 23rd.—Yesterday the enemy appeared in great force at Palestro, with the object of obstructing the march of the reconnoitring party, which had taken the direction of the Sesia by order of the King of Sardinia. The enemy's artillery was, however silenced in every part.

The Austrians had shot an entire family of eight persons in whose house Austrian guns had been found.

The French have occupied Castleggio, where they are fortifying themselves.

A despatch dated Vienna, May 23rd, says,—"At noon on the 21st inst., about 15,000 of the Franco-Sardinian army attacked our troops, numbering 3,000 at Vercelli. Our men retreated fighting to Orlenzo. At this place two other Austrian brigades hurried to the rescue, and threatened the enemy's flanks, which retired across the Sesia to the western side of the river."

It is stated that 30,000 Austrians were about to be concentrated in Bernalberg.

It was reported, via Switzerland, that all the Austrian detachments on the Lago Maggiore have been withdrawn.

All the London papers give confidence to a report that Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell had come to a general agreement on the subject of Parliamentary reform and foreign policy, and that the Derby Government would be compelled to resign soon after the re-assembling of Parliament.

Kossuth had addressed another large audience in favour of the neutrality of England at Manchester. He estimated that he should probably soon be in his native country It was reported that he is the President of the Hungarian Committee, just established at Genoa, the object being to encourage desertion from the Austrian ranks.

The Cunard Company had sold four of their screw steamers to the Spanish government, and they are to be replaced by vessels of greater power and size.

A large fleet is fitting out at Toulon with great expedition. Independent of screw liners and frigates it is to consist of 10 steam gunboats suitable for the shallow shores of the Adriatic.

Accounts from Hungary are extremely alarming, and there must sooner or later be serious disturbances if concessions are not made. The country is full of Russian agents, who act almost openly.

A terrific storm of thunder, lightening, and rain, burst upon Acton on the night of the 30th of April. Steeples twenty and thirty persons were drowned in places where it was thought the water would never reach. One hundred and eighty-seven stone houses were laid in ruins. Nearly all the cisterns were destroyed, and portions of the roads were swept into the valleys.

Description of the Theatre of War.

The Kingdom of Sardinia, composed of Piedmont—its principal mass—in the centre the ancient province of Savoy in the north-west, and the maritime territory of Genoa in the south-east is not above 100 miles in breadth from its western to its eastern frontier. On the former of these frontiers it is conterminous along its entire length with France, its ally; but on the latter it is only partly conterminous with Austria its enemy. In the north a portion of the Swiss territory, and in the south the Duchy of Parma supply the border line, leaving only a central portion—perhaps about half of the entire length—to be formed by the territories Austrian Lombardy. The line in question as everybody is now aware, is constituted by the River Ticino and by the Lago Maggiore, through which that river flows, as the Rhone does through the lake of Geneva. On the French side of the border is formed by the Alps, so that the seat of war may be regarded in a general aspect as a broad piece of territory between a chain of Mountains and river. The French had to cross the mountains, and the Austrians the stream, and the distance between them, as we have said, was about one hundred miles. Piedmont is traversed in its breadth by the windings of the river Po, and the division of the country thus effected corresponds very nearly with the division of the eastern frontier between Lombardy and Parma; so that to the south of the stream Piedmont borders on Parma, and to its north only on the hostile territory of Lombardy. These two divisions of the Sardinian kingdom differ totally in their natural characters. To the north of the river—the district immediately exposed to the Austrians, all is a level plain up to the foot of the Swiss Alps, whereas on the southern side all is mountainous, and the whole space is filled up with the shoots or spurs of the Ligurian Apennines sloping away from Genoa. In this division of the kingdom lie the "strong places" of the Sardinians—Alessandria, Casale, and Tortona, and on its western edge stands Turin itself, the capital of the State. Within or around these fortresses the Sardinians have collected the bulk of the army, perhaps some 75,000 men, leaving the plains of the north comparatively open to the incursions of the enemy. Before the actual commencement of hostilities the Austrians at Milan stood just about as far from the river as the French at Briancon did from the mountains; and a line drawn from one of these points to the other would pass through the common mark of both armies—the royal city of Turin. Turin, however, is about as far again from Buffalora where the Austrians crossed the river, as it is from Susa, where the French halt on crossing the Alps, the distance being about seventy miles in the former case against thirty-three in the latter. But this inequality was more than compensated by the relative difficulties of the two roads, for whereas the Austrians have a plain country to traverse, the French can only reach the Susa by passing the Alps. In reality the advantage of ground so far was on the side of the Austrians, but their operations have been influenced by further considerations, arising from the position of the Sardinian army before described. The French, as they descend upon Susa and push forward to Turin, are directly confronting the Austrians on their march towards the same point from Milan if this was all, and there was no Sardinians except in the capital, the shock of the battle could be anticipated with great faculty.—Sooner or later, in fact very soon indeed,—the belligerents would meet, and an engagement on a large scale would ensue. It will be observed, from what we have said that the Austrians in their advance across Piedmont from east to west would have on their left flank the whole concentrated strength of the Sardinian army, resting on its finest fortresses. What the chain of the Tyrol indeed, is to Austria in the plains of Lombardy, the chain of the Ligurian Apennines is to Sardinia in the plains of Piedmont, and the parallel can be carried still farther, for exactly as Germany lies in reserve behind the Tyrol so does a second French force gather in strength behind the Appennines. On the seaboard of these mountains stands Genoa, which, as France commands the sea, can be reached from Toulin with the greatest facility. The Sardinians, therefore, while they cluster in force about their citadels to the south of the Po, have in their rear the support of a powerful French army within 50 miles' distance. The Austrians are thus opposed by two bodies of the enemy—one directly facing them at Turin, and drawing daily reinforcements from the passes of the Alps; and another at Casale and Alessandria, flanking their march, and reaching succors from a distinct base of operations at Genoa. By crossing their frontier at its northern extremity, as they now have done, they might occupy the northern districts of Sardinia; or, if they descended thence upon the Po, they might get the Sardinian army in front of them, but they would then have the Army of the Alps under their right.—They must, in short, advance in any case against two lines of foes posted at right angles to each other; and, for simplicity's sake, we may consider these lines to be represented by the river Doren Baltea running from north to south by Ivrea, and the Po, running from west to east by Casale—Turin being pretty nearly at the angle. All the places named, be it understood, lie within a comparatively small compass. From Aroasa, the point occupied by the Austrians in the north, to Genoa on the seaboard of the south, the distance is about 110 miles, or very nearly the same as from Susa to Buffalora. From Genoa to Allessandria it is only 46 miles, and from Allessandria to Turin less than 60. From Susa to Turin, again, the distance is but 23 miles; so that in their two principle positions of Turin and Alessandria the Sardinians are, in the one case, within 40 miles, and the other within 50 miles, of their powerful allies. The Austrians, too, would be equally near their resources. Novara is about 5 miles, Mortara about 10 miles, and Vercelli but some 20 miles, from the Lombard frontier, and these are the points at which the first collision may be anticipated. The great feature, however of the campaign as far as it can be comprehended at present, is the double base of operations from which the Sardinians and their allies are proceeding; and if the Austrians find themselves in strength sufficient for such a plan, it is not improbable that they also may divide their forces, so that the troops now said to be at Mortara may advance towards the south, and those at Novara towards the west. It will not have escaped notice that the Austrians are said to be particularly strong at Mortara, while the Imperial Guard, the select corps of the French army, is at Genoa. These dispositions would seem to indicate that the hardest struggle is expected on the line to Genoa rather than up the line to Turin; but this is a point on which we can hardly remain long in the dark.

THE FRENCH ARMY.

Correspondence of the the London Times.

MARSEILLES, Friday, May 13.

The unreadiness of France for war is greater than has been stated, or else the necessities of the war have already proved greater than was anticipated. Curiously enough the difficulty that has been the most severely felt has been the absence of anything like a sufficient and well-organized means of conveying material. Officers who witnessed the services of the Land Transport Corps in the Crimea have contrasted them with what has been done here, and are loud in their regret that the system had not been adopted and kept up here. The ambition of the War Office is to provide each division with one company, consisting, I believe, of about 40 waggons, nine being devoted to medical purposes, and 50 mules to remove the wounded. An officer on the staff of Marshal Randon has been sent here to examine this question. If the means of transport by sea are exhausted he is to dispatch the companies by the Cornis road to Genoa. As a proof of the insufficiency of the means of transport, the batteries of artillery that were first forwarded by sea to Genoa were obliged to be sent with only one ammunition-wagon to each gun, and no more men and horses than were necessary to serve them. There are now in Northern Italy eleven divisions of infantry, each of the strength of about 8,000 men. The 12th and 13th divisions are being formed to be forwarded as early as possible.

The cavalry consists of twelve regiments mounted, on one of which, I believe, numbers much more than 600 horses. There are about six regiments dismounted. All the cavalry of the Guard have left, the Cuirassiers being the last and still here. Six of the regiments are the Chasseurs d' Afrique, mounted on Arab horses, and from whom great things are expected. With the exception of the Cuirassiers of the Guard, all the cavalry is light cavalry, and it is believed that it is in his arm that the Austrians will have the superiority, numerically at least. The country, however, is not favourable for cavalry movements, and it is expected that no real inferiority will be experienced.

The artillery consists of 11 batteries.—We may therefore, reckon the French army in Northern Italy to consist of 90,000 infantry, 8,000 cavalry and 80 guns. I do not give you these figures as positive, but I had them from such a source as to leave no doubt on my mind of their accuracy.—With respect to artillery the war is looked forward to with considerable interest, quite apart from its political aspect. Military men believe that it will resolve many problems, or rather dispel many illusions, as to the part this arm is to play in future operations.

About ten years since the Emperor introduced into the field batteries what is known as the Napoleon gun. It is a brass 12-pounder to throw shot and shell, weighing about 13 cwt., and in fact, equivalent to a 9-pounder bored up to this larger calibre. With this view the horse artillery and field batteries were all armed with the same guns, and howitzers were done away with. The experience acquired in the Crimea, it is now universally admitted, was not favorable to his Majesty's invention.—However desirable the uniformity of calibre may be—to admit of all shots, shells and cartridges being available for every piece—it was discovered to have been obtained at very great sacrifices—range, accuracy and effect. For the horse artillery the gun was too heavy, being double the weight of the 6-pounder with which the English horse artillery are armed. The range was considerably less than the 9-pounder of the English field artillery, although about the same weight, and the shrapnel, grape, and canister which it discharged would be equal in destructive effect to the Grieg from a 13-pounder howitzer attached to the English 6-pounder batteries; and very inferior to the firing for the 24-pounder howitzers attached to the English 9-pounder field batteries. The tardy conviction of these disadvantages and the progress made in rifle ordnance in England have led to the gradual withdrawal of the Napoleon gun, and to the substitution in its place, as far as has been practicable, among the batteries of the army of Italy, of a new pattern rifled field gun, the invention d' un peu de toute le monde. It is a grooved brass piece, of the calibre of a 4-pounder, loading at the muzzle. The shot is a cylindo-conical projectile, of cast iron, with zinc ailettes, or feathers, to take into grooves and give the necessary rotary motion. How the angles of the grooves (in brass) will stand the wear of the cast iron shot has yet to be determined, but the experiment are reported to have been successful and to have given perfect satisfaction to the authorities, although they do not shut their eyes to the danger of introducing radical alterations into an arm so important as the artillery, which, however correct they may be by theory and have satisfactorily stood the test of experiments, have not yet inspired that confidence and security which can only result from the the rough practice of actual war. Although the calibre of the gun is that of a four pounder, the actual weight of the shot, not being spherical, is considerable more—probably six or eight pounds. The range is greater than any field piece in the French service. The weight is so diminished as to require no more than four horses for its draught, which is a saving of two horses to each gun. A less number of gunners are also required, and the piece throws shells and canister. The French infantry are armed with rifle muskets, and Chasseurs de Vincennes with carabines a tige.

EXECUTION OF BYERS FOR THE MURDER OF PHILLIPS.

From the Spectator's Correspondent.

WELLAND (LATE MERRITTSVILLE,) May 31st, 1859.

John Henry Byers, who killed Mr. Thomas Phillips near Ryley's Bridge, a short distance from this place, was hanged to-day Byers was perfectly black. He had been a slave in one of the Southern States, but ran away to Canada nine years ago, where he married and had a family. Last year he obtained work from Mr. Phillips, in chopping wood, but being in a very destitute condition he asked for payment in flour beforehand. This Mr. Phillips refused, and Byers killed him at once. Mrs. Phillips was about going to alarm some of the neighbors when Byers struck her too a blow which stunned her. Being taken up and indicted for the crime, he pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to be hung—a penalty he has just suffered.

Byers was a very ignorant man; he could neither read nor write. He had not been in a church day since he came to Canada. He was visited during his imprisonment by all the clergy of the district, and was baptized by the Rev. Mr. Stannage, the Incumbent of the parish. He expressed repentance, and not subsequently would the child before the mayor of the town, to whom she declared her dream, stating at the same time that the murderers were two men living in the neighbourhood, whom she deliberately pointed out, and further added that the murder was committed at the entrance of the forest, on the road to Grosswardein. The mayor, after receiving this revelation, thought it prudent to make inquiry after the two neighbours indicated by the child, when, singularly enough, they were discovered to be absent from home. This suspicious circumstance induced the mayor to dispatch some officers to the forest alluded to by the child, who discovered the horrible spectacle of five bodies extended on the ground, which were those of the brothers, the two daughters, and the driver of the vehicle in which they all took their departure. The corpses appeared to have all been set on fire, so as to prevent their identity, and the vehicle nowhere discovered. This horrible tragedy led the officers to examine the whole neighbourhood when they fortunately pounced upon the two neighbours at a fair not far distant, as they were in the very act of changing some notes on which some spots of blood were visible. On being seized they immediately confessed the crime, and on the child's dream being revealed to them, acknowledged the finger of Providence displayed in their capture. This wonderful dream on the part of the child, and its fulfilment, excited an immense sensation in the neighbourhood.—Jewish Chronicle.

THE NEW BRITISH PARLIAMENT.—As we confidently predicted, Lord Derby and his colleagues have small reason to be satisfied with the result of their "appeal to the country." Up to the latest date, there was no appearance of their being able to rely on an accession of much more than a dozen votes in the next House of Commons, beyond the number they could command in the last, leaving them in a prospective minority. on a "call of the House" when any important subject comes up, of more than 100 antagonistic votes. In allusion to this result, Mr. Alcock observed, on the hustings (he being the "Liberal" aspirant for representing the eastern division of the county of Surrey,) that as the Conservative party, beginning with the Carlton Club, had expended about a million of pounds sterling in a vain attempt to secure a majority, and allowing that even two dozen of their men, more than before, would be able to obtain seats—that then each additional member would have cost £40,000! We now venture to repeat our prediction, that the days of the Derby administration, perhaps its hours of duration, are numbered.

Turin—The Piedmontese Capital.

On the capital of Piedmont nearly the whole public interest of Europe at this moment centres. This seat of the Sardinian monarchy is situated on a beautiful plain on the Po, which at this point receives the waters of the Dora Ripara. The town is of oblong form, and its circumference about 4 miles. The streets are, in general, wide and straight, intersecting each other at right angles, and running in direct lines from one extremity of the city to the other and many of them are embelished with piazzas at the sides. The principal square near the centre of the town ranks, both from size and beauty, among the most elegant in Europe. On one of its sides stands the royal palace, and on the other there are erected arcades. The materials of which most of the buildings are constructed, is rich marble of every vein and colour. The cathedral is an antique gothic edifice, remarkable principally for its marble cupola. The city possesses a number of beautiful churches, most of them of large size, and built of, or ornamented with marble.—The university contains a court surrounded with arcades, the whole covered with inscriptions and ancient bas-reliefs. It was instituted in the fifteenth century. Altogether, Turin is a beautiful city, worthy of the pleasant land in which it is situated, and one cannot help regretting that there is every prospect of its being again subject to the casualities of war—a calamity which it has more than once undergone during the present century.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—The Examiner of the 26th instant, contains an advertisement of an auction sale which enumerates amongst other things, a Durham bull, which took the prize at the last show for Northumberland, held at Cobourg. With your permission, Sir, I will inform the public that such statement is untrue. I consider it necessary to take this course to remove a false impression from the minds of the community, as the bull which did take the first prize, is in this Township, and it is important that the public should be rightly informed on such matters.

GEO. ESSEN.

Otonabee, May 26, 1859.

"VEGETARIANISM."

MR. EDITOR:—Will you allow me through the medium of your journal to make a few remarks on the article under the above heading, which appeared in the Review of Friday last, signed X. Y. It is quite a curiosity in its way, in fact a multum in parvo. X. Y.'s first assertion is "that man has in all ages used animal food." I hope to prove quite the contrary. All writers of antiquity—of every nation—historians, physicians, philosophers and poets, assert that the generations who lived for the first thousand years, were perfectly simple in their diet—in other words, they were "Vegetarians," and I believe, notwithstanding the assertions of X. Y. to the contrary, not a single instance can be adduced of any nation, however savage, feeding on raw flesh (or even cooked) wher fruits, roots and corn, could be procured. Another physical reason is, his want of natural means for slaying and preparing animals before he could make use of their flesh for food. All animals destined for feeding upon flesh are provided by nature with instruments for catching, tearing, and devouring their prey, but it is not so with man. God hath made him upright, but he has sought out many inventions.—Dr. Wm. Hillary in his "Inquiry into the means of improving medical Knowledge" states that the food of man "during the first ages of the world was taken from the field, consisting of fruits and seeds, with the addition of milk from their flocks, and water for their drink."

Hesiod, the Greek poet, also says, "the uncultivated fields afforded them their fruits," and Pliny, the Roman naturalist, also asserts that "mankind in the first ages subsisted on acorns alone."

Let this suffice, Mr. Editor, for correboration, although ample quotations might be given in disproof of X. Y.'s gratuitous assertions. I suppose X. Y. must be a firm believer in "divine right of Kings to govern wrong." But where did he learn that the essence of Infidels are "mentioned." The absurdities of Deistic theories ing articles on Science, &c., contributed by the "masses" which evidence that they are not only on an equality with the other classes, but that they are in many instances far in advance of them. He who is afraid of intrusting such men with the right of political power they will gain in moral! The higher they rise the better they will become. They will grow up to their destiny. That thousands of them are preparing for it, the history of the masses for the last half century abundantly testify and prove. If X. Y. or his "learned" friend the editor of the Review think the masses are uneducated, let them prove it, remembering that "one fact is worth a cart-load of arguments."

Yours truly,

Obituary.

Deep within the obscurity and forest depths of the rude valley of the Madawaska—a majestic tributary of the Grand River—the hardy Lumberman, Gerrard McCrea, Esq., pitched his solitary shanty where few men of weaker nerve or less than heroic fortitude would venture at the time. Many a year has passed since then, and familiar is the valley to the early pioneers of the back-woods; but the light has passed from it; as it has from the heart of the lumberman; for he mourns to-day the loss of his young wife who was worthy of him—worthy of being called the Angel of the Madawaska.—He long sighed for a son, little dreaming that its birth should bring death to its mother as it now has done! Yes, that fair, beautiful wife, who carried with her into the uncongenial solitudes of her husband's home the refinement of a lady, and the sympathies of a Sister of Charity, has just died giving birth to a son!—died the other day at Springtown, Bagot, County of Renfrew. This most inadequate tribute is due to her memory from the writer, as it is from every other gentleman who has ever tasted of her hospitality, or been agreeably surprised at finding one so refined in so rude a place.

"Sweet Innocence, thou stranger to offence and inward storm:
"He, who yon Heavens involves in clouds of darkness,
"Ever smiles on thee with kind regard."

BY-LAW No.—

A By-Law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough, to raise by way of loan, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds, for the purposes therein specified, and to issue Debentures therefor, and provide for the payment thereof.

Passed the day of A. D. 1859.

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, did on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, pass a By-Law authorizing the Mayor of the said Town, to take three thousand shares of stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Peterboro Railway Company, on behalf of the said Municipality

And Whereas, the said Municipality did borrow from the Municipal Loan Fund, Debentures, to the extent of twenty-five thousand pounds currency, and did also issue Debentures under a By-Law passed on the tenth day of May, A. D., 1858, to the extent of twelve thousand five hundred pounds, for the purpose of paying the stock so subscribed as aforesaid.

And Whereas the sum of eight hundred and twenty-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the said stock so subscribed, and the interest accruing the negotiation of the aforesaid Debentures.

And Whereas the sum of two hundred and twenty-five pounds is required to pay the Government the balance due on the Grant, at the South end of the Town, and the debt of the Town.

And Whereas it is desirable and necessary to expend in grading, gravelling, and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town of Peterborough, the sum of four hundred pounds, making in all for the objects enumerated above, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And Whereas it will require Debentures to be issued to the amount of two thousand pounds, to realise the said sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And whereas it will require the sum of three thousand two hundred pounds, to be raised by a special rate, for the payment of such loan, and interest thereon, for the space of ten years, to be computed from the day of A. D., 1858, to the day of A. D., 1868, inclusive of the first and last days, by annual amounts as follows, that is to say:

For the year 1860, the sum of	£320.
1861	"	320
1862	"	320
1863	"	320
1864	"	320
1865	"	320
1866	"	320
1867	"	320
1868	"	320
1869	"	320

And Whereas it is proposed that Debentures to the amount of Two Thousand Pounds shall be issued, payable with interest at six per cent. as hereinafter mentioned for the purposes aforesaid.

And Whereas the assessed value of the whole ratable property of the said Town of Peterborough amounts to the sum of Seventeen Thousand six hundred and eighty one pounds according to the assessment returns thereof for the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty Eight being the financial year next preceding the year of the passing of this By-Law.

And Whereas it is necessary for the payment of the interest aforesaid and for the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the principal money of the said debentures, according to the requirements of the statutes in such cases made and provided.

And Whereas this By-law has been and was approved of, by a majority of the duly qualified Municipal Electors of the said Town of Peterborough ascertained in the manner pointed out in the third section of the Upper Canada Municipal Act.

Be it therefore enacted by the Town Council of the Town of Peterborough, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that for the purpose of raising the said sum of One Thousand Five Hundred Pounds for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Mayor of the said Town of Peterborough for the time being, and he is hereby authorized, and required to issue debentures upon the credit of the said Town of Peterborough in sums not less than One Hundred Pounds each, and bearing interest at six per cent per annum, to the extent of Two Thousand Pounds as aforesaid, to be under the common seal of the said Town, to be signed by the Mayor and countersigned by the Clerk thereof, to be made payable in ten years from and after the passing of this By-law. The interest to be payable at the office of the Town Treasurer, half yearly on the days of and respectively, in and for each of the said ten years.

And be it enacted by this By-law shall come into force and take effect on the day of A. D. 1859.

TAKE NOTICE

THAT the above is a true copy of a proposed By-law which will be taken into consideration by the Council of this Municipality after one month from the first publication in the Examiner Newspaper, the date of which first publication was on Thursday the ninth day of June, A. D. 1859, and that the votes of the electors of the said Municipality will be taken for the North Ward, in the shop of Hugh Evans, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M., by one Lines Returning Officer. For the Centre Ward in the Livery Stable of Thomas Eastlund, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M., Robert Howe, Returning Officer. For the South Ward in the house or shop of Mathew Lane, on Friday the 1st day of July next at 10 o'clock, A. M., Ivan Officrne Returning Officer. And for the East Ward, in the Town Hall, on Friday the first day of July next at 10 o'clock A. M., James Edwards Returning Officer.

JAMES EDWARDS,
Town Clerk.

Agricultural.

Do not drive wedges down-beside posts to straighten a fence. Dig out and do it well. Wedges look shabby, are shabby.

In setting fence-posts in ground liable to heave put a 1¼-inch pin through the bottom of the post with its ends projecting. The wind affects it less, and the frost cannot raise it.

The most effectual mode of ridding cattle of lice, is to grease the animal thorough with lard or lard-oil.

A great mistake is generally made by purchasers of cows by auction. Every buyer wants a "first-rate cow," and asks as to quality in this respect, but the fattest cows generally brings the highest rate—not considering the fact that the best milkers are always in moderate condition.

At a late discussion on poultry by the Central Farmer's Club, as reported by a correspondent of the N. E. Farmer, J. B. Farmer remarked as follows:

"Last year he had 20 hens, and raised 150 chickens; did not know how many eggs his hens cost him half a cent per day.—This year he had 30 hens; in January he had 50 dozen eggs, mean three eggs; he got 30 cents a dozen. Bought 150 pounds of beef, and kept it by them while it lasted; he pounded up the bone; the hens eat pounded bones greedily. He gives them warm dough once a day in cold weather. If we keep hens for the eggs only, he thinks the Poland, or Black Spanish, or Bolton Greys, are better than the larger breeds. It is profitable to raise chickens; his hens range over a ten-acre pasture; he keeps scraps by them. Hens should be treated gently; hens that are perfectly tame will lay twice as many eggs as wild ones; he thinks hen manure better than guano. Last year he had enough to manure three acres of corn on the hill.'

The use of a pencil, with a little note of time expended taking down and putting up bars, repairing broken ones, and chasing stock that have taken advantage of "a bar down," for data, will enable the farmer to arrive at a conclusion as to the relative profit of well-constructed, securely-fastened gates, or bars, through which you find it necessary to bore holes and drive pins in order to keep "the old sow from rooting them open." Especially on the road should each entrance to a field be protected by a good gate, and there are few farmers who stop to think of it, but will discover the profit of such an institution wherever it is necessary to pass in and out of a field often.

POTATO CHEESE.—Select good white potatoes, boil them, and when cold, peel and reduce to a pulp with a rash or mortar, have it perfectly smooth and fine. To five pounds add one pint of sour milk and a little salt; knead it well and let it stand covered for three or four days, according to the season knead them again, make into cheeses and place it in baskets or sieves and place in the shade. These cheeses will keep for any length of time in a covered jar in a dry place.

A very insignificant indication of the abundandance of vegetation this season was observable in the Hamilton market on Saturday. All kinds of green stuffs was most abundant, while new potatoes of large size were offered at 25 cents a quart, and any quantity of butter at 10c and 12½c per lb.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S
CHOP CRINDER.
This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 18 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.
All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.
PRICE $40.
All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.
The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.
Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."
N. B.—Any persons infringing upon this Patent, will be prosecuted to the utmost extent the law will allow. Patent dated March 16th, 1859.

TAKING THE NEWSPAPERS.

CHAPTER I.

"Talk to me about your newspapers! I tell you, neighbour Parker, they are nothing but a darned humbug!" exclaimed Farmer Jones.

"That's a great mistake of yours, neighbor. For my part I would rather live on two meals a day than be without a good newspaper."

"Well, well, I wonder what the world's a comin' to. There's my girls have teased me to take Harper's Magazine till I hadn't any peace o' my life. But I put my foot right down; you can't humbug me with sich trash;" and Farmer Jones complacently wiped away the tobacco juice which was streaming down from the corner of his mouth.

"You are in the wrong, neighbour Jones."

"No, I am not. Then Tom want satisfied, and nothin' would do but I must take the Examiner and the Canadian Agriculturist. But it won't no use; I would'nt have the trash in the house, say nothin' o' wastin' money on it."

"Do you ever read the papers?"

"Me! no, not I; I've got a better use for my time."

"But the long winter evenings?"

"Well, I have always some little fixin' to do round the house."

"Not all winter?"

"No; but when I can't find no work to do, I'd a great sight rather set in the corner, and go to sleep."

"But your son Reuben takes the papers."

"Yes; but I never brought him up to do any sich thing. He takes the Examiner and the Agriculturist both, and strews his brains over 'em half the time. That ain't the worst of it, nither."

"No evil effects have followed from it, I trust?"

"Yea, there has; there's my youngest boy, Tom, read somethin' or other over to Reuben's the other day about a 'chance for young men,' and nothin'll do but he must go right into it; he's off to Toronto next week. So much for havin' newspapers round."

"But perhaps he may improve the opportunity, and make money by it."

"No sich thing. He's got £25, and when that's all gone, he'll be back again; see if he don't."

"Perhaps not."

"Well, my mind's made up about it; but between you and I and the side of that gate-post, I wouldn't mind givin' Reuben the price of the papers if he only wouldn't take 'em."

"But Reuben has the reputation of being one of the best farmers in the Township."

"That's all true enough; but he didn't learn how to farm it from his newspapers, let me tell you. He was brought up in the good old way, when there wan't no books round but the Bible and the current almanac."

"You will grant that he does not follow all the old fashioned methods?"

"Well, pretty much all; he's got some notions of his own, though."

"How is it about grinding the food before giving it to the cattle, neighbor Jones?"

"We'll, I believe Reuben does that."

"And he saves £25 a-year by it, you know."

"Yes, but it is the grinding does the business."

"Exactly so. He seen the advertisement in the paper about Aldus Mowry's Chop Grinder, and he went off to Peterboro', and got one at once; it works so well all the neighbors intend getting them. Supposing you order one at the same time, Farmer Jones?"

"Well, I'll think about it. But I don't believe in these machines that you see so much in the papers. They aren't what they're crack't up to be."

But it was no use arguing the matter, any longer, so the two farmers separated.

CHAPTER II.

When Farmer Jones got home, he found a stranger awaiting him.

"I understood you had a large quantity of wheat for sale," said the stranger.

"Well, I've got considerable, but I don't care about sellin' it."

"I should like to buy."

"I can spare a hundred bushels for a fair price."

"What do you ask for it?"

"Well, I don't know; how is wheat these days."

"Last sales in Toronto were 6s to 6s 3d per bushel."

"Rather low; I meant to get 6s 6d for mine," returned Farmer Jones, who was disposed to be shrewd.

"What will you take for the lot," said the stranger.

"Six and six-pence."

"Say six-and-three, and we won't stand about trifles."

"Can't do it; six shillings and six-pence is my lowest price," replied Farmer Jones finding that he had got an available customer.

"Split the difference."

"Couldn't do it."

"I'll take it then. Give me a receipt for this cask to bind the bargain."

Farmer Jones congratulating himself on the good trade he had made, wrote the receipt after considerable labor, and put the money in his pocket book.

"Know of any one also who has got any corn to sell?"

"My neighbour Parker, I'm thinkin', has got some."

"You won't say a word that I paid you 6s 6d the yearn? It might spoil a trade."

"Not a word," replied Farmer Jones.

Towards night our two farmers happened to meet again.

"Sold your wheat to-day, neighbour Parker?" inquired Farmer Jones.

"Every speck of it," replied Parker.

"Did you? What did you get?"

"Seven shillings."

"How much?"

"Seven shillings."

"You didn't, though, did ye?" exclaimed the man who wouldn't take the newspaper.

"That is just what I got, and I think I could have got 1d more on a bushel if I had stuck a little longer."

"Do you say so?"

"The same man bought yours, I believe."

"Yes," replied Farmer Jones, edging off.

"What did you get—seven shillings?"

"Well, I didn't get that either."

"O, six and-ninepence?"

"Well, after all, that is a good price, and 6d more on a bushel than I had ever any idea of getting. I did not get six-and-ninepence," was Farmer Jones' reply, looking rather crestfallen.

He did not like to deceive his neighbor; he had studied the Bible and the almanac enough to know better than that; but it came "dreadful hard" to own up the truth.

"I daren't tell."

"Why not?"

"I've got took in if the fellow gave you seven shillings."

"What did you get, though, neighbor?"

"Six-and-sixpence."

"Well, you have been taken in, then; I guess you haven't heard the news."

"No!—what?"

"Why, war has commenced in Europe, so that our breadstuffs will be extensively exported, which run up the price of flour and grain."

"What war?"

"Between France and Austria."

"France! Well, I hope them cursed French will get licked," emphatically replied Jones.

"You differ from the world in general," said Parker, "The sympathies of the country go with France in this quarrel; for she is trying to restore to Italy her liberty."

"You don't say so! When I was a boy the schoolmaster used to teach me to hate the French. He used to say that France was a warlike nation, and that our Wellington whipped their Napoleon in the Peninsulary war!"

"Oh, you mean the Peninsular war, neighbor Jones," replied Farmer Parker, trying at the same time to repress a laugh which had already begun to break over his intelligent-looking visage.

"Some sich name. At any rate, it happened if I think right, about the time that Cromhwell the King of the Caniphant Islands died," said Farmer Jones, beatitatingly.

Farmer Parker could no longer resist the temptation of laughing at the historical errors of his less-favoured neighbor Jones. After resuming his usual gravity Farmer Parker remarked,

"I think, you will confess now that you had better take a paper."

"Confess no such thing; I wouldn't have one round the house."

"If you had taken the papers, you would have known about this rise in the price of grain."

"Perhaps I should; but Reuben generally tells me about these things."

"It was only in the paper that came to-day; I read it since I last saw you.—But I should no more think of selling anything of any consequence without seeing how the markets were than I should think of cutting my own throat.

"Kind of a dog's life to be tied to a newspaper," sneered Farmer Jones.

"But if you had taken a newspaper, neighbor, and read it, you would have made £5 by it in this one trade. Only think of it—enough to pay for the paper 10 years."

"Git away! These things look very well as you book farmers figger 'em up; but, you see, when you come to the scratch they ain't nowhere."

"I looks to me like a plain case."

"Now, 'spose I could make £5 by taking the paper; it would do me a darn sight more mischief than that."

"How is that?" queried Farmer Parker.

"Why the newspaper puts the very devil in the girls heads. Now they never used to have these cursed soirees and picnics round here tills the girls got readin' of 'em in the newspapers. And then the burvin' ground, they couldn't even let that alone. Some fellow put a piece in the papers about Little Lake, City of the Dead, God's Acre, and some sich place, and the fust thing we know the graves are all jumbled up in a heap, gravel is carted in, and posies set out all over it.—Now they call it a 'symmetry,' I believe."

"A cemetery, neighbor; but we who read the newspapers like these things.—There is something pleasant in ornamenting with flowers the resting place of the dead."

"It looks to me more like sacrelation!"

"Sacrilege! O, no; far from it."

"Well, I think so; and then we have got to get new school houses, a new Town Hall, and the roads all MacDonalized."

"MacAdamized."

"Well, no matter what it is; it all comes of these cursed newspapers. My taxes are £2 a-year more than they used to be."

"And you sell the produce of your farm for £100 more.

"Well, that's true; but there's no kind of need of making the taxes any more, all for newspapers."

"But you must think how much wiser and better your family would be with a newspaper to read."

"By mighty! I should think they would! Only look at Duncan Craig's folks. Them girls cant hire a fortune every year to knit and sew gowns."

"But it is it very worthy and intelligent family, and the deacon's income, owing to his more enlightened method of fertilizing himself, is at least ten times as great as it used to be, and he can well afford to spend all he does in educating his children."

"His son o' folkin' about his size are the same old yarn; and when Jim Craig's shirt at all particular about having buttons and white wrists grown' on my farm," and Farmer Jones went off, wondering what the world was coming to.

CHAPTER III.

Some time after their conversation, Tom Jones came home to visit his father. The ambitious youth, who had acquired one half his education by reading the newspapers, had not written his father concerning his business prospects.

"Why, Tom, what have you been about all this time?" asked the old gentleman, as he surveyed Tom's spruce appearance.

"Making money, father," replied the hopeful son.

"Have you made any, Tom?"

"A little! Guess you'd better staid at home, and worked on the farm. You was doin' well here."

"Done pretty well as itsin."

"How much you made, Tom?"

"About a Hundred Pounds."

"Git out! You are jokin', Tom."

"True as preaching."

"How did you do it?"

"Well, I went into that 'chance for young men;' but that wasn't much; so I looked into the newspapers for something better."

"Newspapers again," sneered Farmer Jones.

"The first thing I saw," continued Tom, "was that wool was selling in the New York market for 2s a pound, while I could buy it round Ontario and this County for 1s 6d. You see the risk in transporting it made the difference. In this way you see, father, I made the money."

"You are a shrewd one, Tom."

"All owing to the newspapers, you see, father."

"Get away with you!"

"I see by the papers that the Chinese empire has been divided, and the rebels are on a fair way of making China a Christian country. I have a great notion of going out to establish a line of stages between Shanghae and Nankin. What do you think about it?"

"Don't know what to think. I'm done thinkin'; but, Tom, when you go to Peterboro' again, just drop in and tell 'em to send me the Examiner and the Agriculturist for one year. Here's the three dollars."

"Bravo! you are a brick, after all, pa!"

And young Tom Jones who has been a subscriber himself for some time, called in and related the above anecdote, requesting us to place his father's name on our subscription list, and to publish the above for the good of those who "won't take the paper."

The Merciful Find Mercy.

"Oh! Henry, is it thus you reward me for all these years of patient love and undoubting faith in you? Are you serious in saying that for a fairer, younger and more wealthy bride you will forsake the chosen of your youth? Tell me—oh! do tell me—that this is only a horrid dream; that you are not so false, so merciless!"

Thus cried, with passionate gestures, and agonized features, a young woman to a man several years her senior, who stood regarding herself with a cool determined look.—Not a muscle of his face moved—not a nerve of his heart trembled—as she made her passionate appeal. His face was not easily discomposed, and his heart was as adamant. The glance of his cold, blue eye grew more steely still, and a disagreeable smile drew back the corners of his lips, as he replied:

"You seem strangely to forget your womanly pride, Agnes. Once I wouldn't have thought of you as one who could stoop to insist that any man should marry her."

The blood which had forsaken the girl's face and gathered suffocatingly about her tortured heart, now rushed in a hot flood back, turning her scarlet to the very hair. She started from her crushed and heart-broken position, and with eyes flashingly indignation and scorn, said:

"Nor do I now! Go from this house, Henry Howard! I thank you for disclosing to me so clearly the dragon's foot, and the abject soul which, many a time, I have had cause to fear might be yours. Go! I say. Why do you tarry? I would not marry you were you to offer me a crown! Do you linger in order to say what shall help me to bear losing you. Kind sir! but be sure that further words are unnecessary. You have said what will be sufficient to support me. My heart will not break.—Begone!"

But it was not thus that the false lover wished to go. He was utterly confounded at the mine his insulting words had sprung. Was this his meek and gentle Agnes? Was he to be thus turned from the house out of which he had expected hardly to be able to draw himself for her clinging arms, her prayers, and sobs, and tears. Ah! sweet gentleman—it is proverbial that "still waters run deep." You had better depart.

Human nature is a strange thing. As well as he could love any one but himself, Howard had loved Agnes; and now that he saw her in so unnatural a mood, he began to dislike to have her hate him. He had not thought her capable of so resenting anything he could say or do. His mean soul was a little shaken; and in a very different manner he now confronted his companion.

"But, Agnes," he began. She pointed to the door, turned suddenly upon her head and left the room.

* * * * * * *

"Please, sir, do let me sit a little while, this bundle is so heavy, and I am not well. I won't do any harm here."

It was a pitiful, rugged child that spoke to the rich merchant, as he paused to order her from his humble steps.

"Clear out! I can't help it if you are tired. Can't have my steps cluttered up with beggars and their brattles. Off with you!"

The child rose feebly, and tottered away; and the rich Mr. Howard entered his elegant mansion—his by his wife, the handsome young heiress, for whom he left Agnes.

* * * * * * *

"We have been able to get but very little work, sir; and besides, we have all been sick for the last few weeks. If you would but give us a little more time, we would try hard to pay."

"The money or the house, by noon to-morrow?" was the hard reply.

"Oh! sir, consider my poor son! He is too sick to be removed. It will cost his life! Will you not have some mercy upon us? You are a rich man it is true; but you may need mercy yourself yet. Give us one week more."

"The money or the house!" said Howard, as he moved away.

* * * * * * *

"Have mercy on me sir! Oh! in the name of God, have mercy. It was for my wife and her young baby, but it would kill her. Do not expose me! I will work it out. I never did such a thing before; and it was only five dollars to buy wine and things that she could eat, for my poor feeble Mary. Have mercy! have mercy! or God will be merciless to you."

"Have done with this outcry. You are a thief, and I shall not stand between you and justice. Officers, do your duty!"

And Mr. Howard quietly returned to his accounts. Strange that no thought of the account that was running up against himself ever entered his head.

* * * * * * *

"Oh! uncle do not send me forth into the storm to die. Have some pity! I make no excuse; but remember that the Lord was merciful even to one like me.—For His sake let me stay till this storm is over I cannot—I cannot go out into the street this night!"

"We shall see if you cannot my lady. Have you tied up your things or do you choose to go without them? Come, make haste. You may take that handkerchief full of clothes if you'll be quick; but tramp you shall within fifteen minutes. And mind you shall never let me see your face again."

"Uncle! uncle! for my mother's sake let me remain."

"Your mother's sake! My sister was a decent woman, and for her sake I will turn such a baggage as you are out of doors.—Hurry, will you!"

* * * * * * *

"Not this month's wages, yer honor? Oh! not this month's wages, for me mother is sick, and wants it every cent. Och, yer honor, ye wouldn't be keeping back this month's wages, when it might cost me mother's life!"

The steel in Howard's eyes never softened as he sternly replied—

"Yes this month's wages, girl. They are already due; and we are therefore sure of our pay for all that you have so carelessly smashed. You would very likely walk off rather than pay for them were I to hand you the wages for the month just closing. You Irish are always ready with a story. Your mothers and cousins come amazingly handy. Hush! I won't hear a word. Down stairs with you. I want to read in peace."

The old mother was turned from her cabin, and, in consequence, she soon died. The young niece—who staked her all upon man's truth, and lost—went, in her hour of agony, forth into the storm, and in the darkness she and her child both perished—God only knows with how long or how short a struggle. The clerk was shut within a prison; and the shock of hearing this, and what it was was for was more than his poor, pale young wife could bear; misery and despair broke her heart; and before her husband was set free, she was hid from his sight in the grave.

The poor family—one of whom Mr. Howard ordered from his steps the day he turned them all into the street—found a rude shelter in the shed of a neighbor, and there the sick son breathed his last, amid the silent and hopeless sorrow of his family.

Agnes—whose heart he wrung most bitterly, and whose self-respect he outraged—was the only one benefited by his cruelty. It was a mercy to her, for it saved her from the curse of becoming his wife; and she afterwards married a man.

* * * * * * *

"Mercy! mercy! mercy! Oh, God! oh God! have mercy!" The shriek of the dying man rang fearfully through all that lofty dwelling.

The children in the nursery heard the cry, clung together in terror. The servants in the basement heard it, and superstitious dread seized on their hearts. His wife by his bedside heard it, and with blanched cheek, and trembling lips, strove to calm the sufferer.

"Shall I not send for the minister," she said.

"No! no! he can do me no good.—Only one can do me good, and he——"Therefore I will laugh at your calamity, and laugh when your fear cometh!'" yelled the wretched being; and then he sank in a frenzied manner, why his wife allowed his current alone to come and scream such awful things into his ears.

"No one is here, my dear husband. Why will you not let me read to you something from the Bible? I am sure you need not be so distressed. You have always been such a just man; and on particular about going to church, and paying your part of all expenses; and then you know that God is so merciful."

"Yes, yes—'to the merciful' I will show myself merciful? But I——'He that shutteth up the bowels shall mock!' again he shrieked; and then, muttering and twisting, as if in ghastly pain, he besought his wife to turn, not the wife of his clerk, who had requested this passage to terrify him; and to drive away all the ghastly fears Agnes was heaping into the soul-stricken, to commend his task.

"I cannot, can beyond them! [illegible] them hard every way so that I cannot rest! Oh! I am going, and I shall not be heard my cry. They hold it down! It does not reach Him! Oh, mercy! mercy! mercy!"

He sprang to his feet, and tossed his arms on high. Horror, despair, and the extremity of fear and woe set on the features never stamped with sympathy or moved by pity for another's sorrow. Falling forward upon his face, with one last groan the man that was not merciful went forth to meet his doom!

We may not judge the dead; but who would die the death of the merciless!

Queen Victoria.

That Alexandrina Victoria should ever have ascended the English throne, is perhaps the only remarkable event in her life.—George III. left five sons, the elder, of course, the heir, the others in all likelihood forever debarred from the succession. The heir, the Prince of Wales, reigned as George IV., and died childless, the second son, the Duke of York, died without reigning, and likewise childless; the third son, the Duke of Clarence, reigned as William IV., and died childless; the fourth son, Edward, Duke of Kent, died without reigning, but left one child, a daughter; and to her, thus remote from the inheritance, descended the patrimony of the house of Hanover and Brunswick.

When Victoria was six years old, her mother appointed the Rev. George Davys her preceptor; his fidelity and zeal proved the wisdom of her choice. The Baroness Lehzen was associated with him as instructress. Up to her eleventh year the princess was totally unaware of her claims upon the succession or of any possible concatenation of events by which her condition in life would be materially changed. In 1827 the Duke of York died, and in 1830 King George followed him. The accession of King William, whose two daughters were already dead, placed her next the throne.—Her education was now such as would best fit her to wear the crown. Without overtasking her mental or physical energies, her instructors plied her with every species of knowledge by which a queen might profit.

She was familiar with the lives and actions of all who had conferred honor on the human race, whether of sovereigns, statesmen, scholars, inventors, discoverers, benefactors, poets or divines. While yet in her teens, and not yet in her majority, she spoke English, French and German, with equal fluency; she read Italian, and translated Virgil and Horace; she was proficient in mathematics, and showed decided talent in all branches connected with the science of numbers. Accomplishments were not neglected, and the Princess danced, sang, and sketched from nature.

On the 17th of July, Victoria made her first public appearance as sovereign of the nation. She prorogued Parliament in person, addressing the members of the two chambers, from the throne in the House of Lords. Her pallor betrayed her emotion, but the manner was composed and her bearing at once childlike and royal. Her voice was distinct, though tremulous. Victoria I. was crowned at Westminster Abbey, on the 28th of June, 1838.

THE INFIDEL'S SON.

There was a prosperous farmer in the State of New York, who had, in early life been led to read certain infidel writers, and their statements, acting upon his depraved mind, led him to reject the Bible as a revelation from God. As he lived in the midst of a church-going community, he, out of regard to his reputation, was a regular attendant upon public worship, and seldom gave any intimation of the fact that he was an infidel.

By degrees, he began to throw out objections to the Bible, and to absent himself from the sanctuary. A powerful revival brought out the latent enmity of his heart to God. He then made an open declaration of his infidelity, and was most earnest, not to say fiend-like, in his opposition to every thing connected with evangelical religion.

He was at that time the father of a family. His children were encouraged to violate the Sabbath, and taught to scoff at sacred things.

He soon became intemperate, and poverty came upon him. His children became ragged and vicious. His wife died, it was thought, of a broken heart.

Soon after her death, the first Sunday school was established in the place. By a strange want of understanding of the design of the institution, few children, except from families in which religious instruction was not imparted, were invited to become members of the school. Of course many such refuse to attend.

No one ventured to ask the intemperate infidel to send his children to the Sunday school.

One sabbath a sermon was preached on the condescension of the Saviour—and the fact of his associating with publicans and sinners, was particularly dwelt upon. A young son of the nearest neighbor of the infidel listened attentively to the sermon.—He had been taught to obey the children of the infidel that evil communications might not corrupt good manners. He had often felt a great sympathy for them, as he had contrasted their miserable with his own happy lot. He had never treated them unkindly. With John, a boy about his own age, he had been a little more familiar than was quite agreeable to his parents.

The sermon led him to inquire if he could not do something for the infidel's children, even if it were at the expense of associating with them. In the course of the week he saw John several times, and made him happy by kindly noticing him, and finally proposed to him that they should both go to the Sunday school. The offer was accepted. John became a member of the school. The teacher was a kind lady, who won his heart. It then not require a great exhibition of kindness to win the heart of the destitute?—NO.

The Times gives an interesting description of the present condition of the Arsenal. No less than 1000 pieces of field ordnance [illegible] for the Estimates this year, by private contractors alone; and this great manufacturer looks hopefully to tendering for 1500 more of the largest and heaviest calibre. But, even without these resources, England is amply provided, even at the present moment, with guns enough to carry on a European war for years to come. There are now in store at Woolwich very nearly 12,000 pieces of iron ordnance, [illegible] from this number old guns and 24-pounders, which are now no longer named either on ships or forts, there are still available for service at any moment upwards of 7000 cannons, all of the best modern make and heaviest calibre. In this number, of course, no account is taken of the store guns at the great dockyards, at each of which there are kept from 1000 to 1500 heavy cannons of the very newest description. The resources of Woolwich Arsenal are now equal to bringing forward, fitting, and mounting these reserve guns for more service at the rate of 200 per week, and on an emergency this number could be increased to nearly 500. At present the orders are to get ready and send off forthwith 100 of these heavy ordnance weekly; and they are accordingly being mounted and shipped off to Malta, Corfu, Gibraltar, and other ports in the Mediterranean with the utmost rapidity. Ordnance of the heaviest description is also being shipped for the Canadian forts, and sent round in lighters to replace the light guns of the martello towers and coast defences, especially on the eastern shores of this island. All the shot and shell used in our wars were formerly made by private firms at an average price of about £13 per ton; but, during the Crimean war a foundry was erected at the Arsenal for the special manufacture of shot and shell. The success which attended this plan led to its gradual extention, till now, all the shot and shell we are ever likely to use in wars of the greatest magnitude could be supplied with ease by the every day working of the Arsenal foundry, and this, too, at a saving to the nation of no less than £6 per ton.—Not only are the ordnance factories in the state of activity we have described, but those devoted to the construction of small arms are in an equally efficient state.—There are between 80,000,000 and 90,000,000 rounds of Minie ammunition in store, and the Minie bullet machines are turning the conical balls at the rate of 2,000,000 rounds per week, a number which can always be increased to 3,000,000 by keeping the machines going night and day.—Of percussion caps we should be afraid to say how many millions there are ready, or how many hundred thousand could be manufactured per day if necessary. On the whole, even from this brief summary of the preparations at Woolwich, our readers will be able to see that they are on a somewhat extensive scale, and ready intended for defensive purposes, are of a nature well calculated to make even the most timid, sleep securely. But, whether meant for defensive or offensive operation, it is rather a comfort in the way of a novelty to know that this time we are well prepared for whatever eventualities may arise, and that if, unfortunately, England be compelled to take part in the war, it will be with such power and resources at command as will astound the world.

Our "Faithful Ally."

From the Saturday Review.

We have seen strange things in our generation; and not the least strange has been the course ourselves have shown. A reckless adventurer, combining courage with craftiness, has won his way to an imperial crown. At every step he has trampled under foot an oath. Solemn protestations and reiterated vows were to him but as dust to blind the eyes of his countrymen.—Under the mask of patriotism he stole his way towards power. In the gay dawn of one December morning, France awoke to find the sword she had intrusted to him to defend her glittering at her own throat—her representative assembly dispersed — her leading men in chains—and her cannon directed against herself. The shepherd had turned his arm against the sheep. The penalties he had invoked upon his own head, if ever he should prove untrue, were inflicted first upon those who had persisted in committing all its integrity. Over the dead bodies of Frenchmen, and amid the blaze of civil war, this protector of order clutched on his reign, and a French empire once more began.

England, suspicious to the end, still trusted. She only saw in the usurper a security for the present quiet and ultimate benefit of France—as if grapes could be gathered from thorns, or as if any public good could come from a course of unblushing wickedness. Napoleon the Third had elected "old avowed deeds of his life."—There were others as yet unaccomplished. But we closed our eyes. We grasped in honesty the hand which was held out to us. We took to ourselves to ally from whose friendship even English gentlemen should have shrunk. Then came visits to our Queen—extravagant displays of his insincere affection—while the French people sullen, half angry, watched us clasping to our breast a man who had lied to his own subjects, and fawned on all whom he had afterwards betrayed. The Crimean war passed, however, to justify our confidence. Our armies and his fought side by side before Sebastopol, and their blood was commingled in the trenches. But the negotiations which ensued upon its conclusion whatever they may have effected, certainly did not show that the French Emperor was over solicitous for the honor or the interests of England. They resulted in a virtual abandonment of the principle for which he had fought. Nor was it long before the Bonapartist journals teemed with rumors, apparently too well-founded, of a secret understanding between England's ally and England's foe but. Last year Imperial [illegible] culminated in the curious episode in the French colonels. The inauguration of Cherbourg followed, and if some in this country were alarmed at the sentiment [illegible] that day, matters of our Government. Those who muttered of contingent dangers were then threatened — were [illegible] reproaches of unfriendliness. Lord Malmesbury was put [illegible] it. Lord Palmerston and French [illegible] themselves to Cherbourg, and found they were in their host's country to the full extent of [illegible] Why [illegible] Portugal [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] general concord being caused by two French Revolutions. In this long period, the happiest in the modern history of mankind, Europe had made progress of every sort. The most remote districts were being intersected by railways; everywhere commerce and mutual intercourse were softening the asperities of character and rooting out the antipathies of education. In spite of internal troubles, the fruit of Socialist and democratic teachings, the States of Europe made continual progress in removing the inevitable discords of provincial feeling, while the great Powers were linked together by a mutual confidence which made eternal peace seem no Utopia at the Exhibition of 1851.

How different is the present situation of Europe need not be said. At the instigation of a Sovereign hardly twelve months on the throne, Turkey "tore to pieces the cobwebs of diplomacy," and rushed into a war. Our own countrymen followed with all the headstrong energy of their character. To the advantages derived from this great conflict we can not blind. It proved that the Russians have no strength for the conquering of a single province of Europe if steadily resisted, and that the march to India is the wildest of dreams. It also taught Englishmen by terrible experience the deficiencies of their military organization, and will enable them to prepare for contingencies more serious than the attack on a Black Sea fortress. But these results, it must be allowed, are collateral, and Turkey will, we think, prove to have gained little by the alliance of Western Europe for her independence. The Christian populations have been more than ever filled with the belief that their religion and nationality, are in danger from the Porte's sovereignty, while the rupture between Russia and Austria will prevent the latter from exercising that influence over the Czar which formerly compelled him to keep his co-religionists within bounds. The end of the Moldo-Wallachian dispute is to place the two Provinces under the rule of an obscure agent of Russia, and the vaunted constitution will in a year or two be utterly forgotten, it having served its turn in giving supreme power to the nominee of Napoleon III. and Alexander. Throughout the semi-independent provinces, and even in Roumelia, there prevails an expectation that the Italian war is to have its counter-shock in Turkey, and the more active spirits even contemplate an invitation to England to relinquish her protectorate over the Ionian Republic. If such hopes generally produce the events they refer to, a lengthened war can hardly fail to cause dangerous complications in Turkey. In fact the northern provinces of the Ottoman Empire are just as far gone in excitement as Sardinia and Tuscany were six months ago, and when we see what a few weeks have brought forth we cannot but look anxiously in this direction. In the meantime Turkey, poor and exhausted by the late war, with hardly a remnant of her lately respectable navy, is as little as possible ready to engage in military operations against her insurgent provinces.

But there is another quarter in which, according to some accounts, mischief is brewing. In Europe, Christian is opposed Mahomedan, and populations are inflamed; in Africa the excitement is confined to the Palace, and the ambition burns only in the breast of a Pasha. It may be said, then, that the Egyptian Viceroy is suspected of a desire to loosen a little the bonds of his allegiance, and that his hopes are fixed on that great champion of the oppressed, the French Emperor. Said Pasha has surrounded himself more than ever by French advisers, and from them he learns that the duty of all noble spirits is to trample on treaties which make a province dependent on a central authority. The result of these counsels is a scarcely concealed desire to take advantage of any disturbances which may arise in Turkey for the purpose of obtaining, if not independence, at least a larger measure of authority. French influence for the present is supreme, and M. Lesseps, whose project had been all but forbidden, is now allowed to spend his share-holders' capital, so far as it exists, in commencing the works for one of his Gigantic moles into the Mediterranean.

Although there can be no doubt that France has always had a desire to rival this country in Egypt, where the ambition of her rulers has been twice so signally foiled, and though she would gladly make the Viceroy independent of the Porte if she could substitute her own protection, yet we can afford to see without the slightest alarm these intrigues of the ignorant Prince who rules at Cairo. Would that there were no more danger to Turkey and to us than can be hatched on the banks of the Nile! We care little for what the French adventurers in the Egyptian service can do, because we know that England in this matter would not allow trifling for a moment. Englishmen have no desire to fill posts in the Vice-regal service. They have not the implacable requisite for men who would ingratiate themselves with an Oriental ruler, nor are they able to forget the habits and the moral standards of their own country. But the subjection of Egypt to the Porte and the entire exclusion of any undue European influence is a matter of vital importance to us, and we may say that now the labourers of many years have been crowned with success. We have completed our communications with India, we have made our railway from Alexandria to Suez, which the Emperor Napoleon said was originally devised to interrupt, and by this time the telegraph is laid down along the whole length of the Red Sea; we have concluded arrangements for transporting troops to India across the Isthmus, and in these enterprises we are bound to say the successive Viceroys have shown much good sense and moderation.—Thus are the solid bases of English influence, and, while we have these, all the intrigues and machinations of continental rivals can have but little result. The Pasha knows how much he has to gain by us, inasmuch as Englishmen almost wholly support the railway, which is a great source of his property, and the steamers which have the post of these will soon vie in number and time with those which now cross the Atlantic. No other nation has relations at all comparable with these, or could confer such benefits on a friendly Prince. On the other hand, the slightest sign of a disposition to cough up some of the money now on the Bosphorus would at once set all Europe on the alert. We hold Malta and Corfu on the one side, Sydney and Hong Kong on the other, and from and over all the whole advance from either quarter to bring an overwhelming force would be certain. The attempts attributed to said Pasha are not likely to confirm the confidence naturally caused by a [illegible]

Agricultural.

A New Potato.

A new agricultural wonder made its appearance in Philadelphia last week, in the shape of what is called the "Peachblow Potato." A whole cargo of them arrived from New Jersey, where they were raised from seed originated by Mr. John R. Sears of New York. It seems that Mr. Sears last year had a large quantity of these potatoes to dispose of for seed, and to induce farmers to purchase and plant, he engaged to give 60 cents per bushel for all the product. Many farmers in the river counties of New Jersey accordingly purchased, and some 25,000 bushels were raised the present season. The merit of the new article is in its great productiveness, combined with its being a really desirable edible. An acre in Burlington County planted with three and a half barrels of seed, yielded 332 bushels of potatoes, and two acres in Salem County, planted with five barrels of seed, yielded 900 bushels. The average product 200 bushels per acre. It is said the variety succeeds better in New Jersey and Pennsylvania than in New York, and that where the farmers in the former are within reach of marl, the product is very large and the quality very superior. The cargo received here met with quick sale at good prices, and it is quite certain that the ... potato has now obtained so strong a foothold among the farmers, that no further canvas will be required to insure its continued cultivation.

BY-LAW No.—

A By-Law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough, to raise by way of loan, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds, for the purposes therein specified, and to issue Debentures therefor, and provide for the payment thereof.

Passed the day of A. D. 1859.

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, did on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, pass a By-Law authorising the Mayor of the said Town, to take three thousand shares of stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company, on behalf of the said Municipality

And Whereas, the said Municipality did borrow from the Municipal Loan Fund, Debentures, to the extent of twenty-five thousand pounds currency, and did also issue Debentures under a By-Law passed on the tenth day of May, A. D., 1858, to the extent of twelve thousand five hundred pounds, for the purpose of paying the stock so subscribed as aforesaid.

And Whereas the sum of eight hundred and twenty-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the said stock so subscribed, and the expenses attending the negotiation of the aforesaid Debentures.

And Whereas the sum of two hundred and seventy-five pounds is required to pay the Government for the balance due on the Land, at the South end of the Town, and the claims of the Squatters thereon.

And Whereas it is desirable and necessary to expend in grading, gravelling, and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town of Peterborough, the sum of four hundred pounds, making in all for the objects enumerated above, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And Whereas it will require Debentures to be issued to the amount of two thousand pounds, to realise the said sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And whereas it will require the sum of three thousand two hundred pounds, to be raised by a special rate, for the payment of such loan, and interest thereon, for the space of ten years, to be computed from the day of A. D., 1859, to the day of A. D., 1869, exclusive of the first and last days, by annual amounts as follows, that is to say:

For the year 1859, the sum of £320.
" 1860 " " 320
" 1861 " " 320
" 1862 " " 320
" 1863 " " 320
" 1864 " " 320
" 1865 " " 320
" 1866 " " 320
" 1867 " " 320
" 1868 " " 320

And Whereas it is proposed that Debentures to the amount of Two Thousand Pounds shall be issued, payable with interest at six per cent. as hereinafter mentioned for the purposes aforesaid.

And Whereas the assessed value of the whole ratable property of the said Town of Peterborough amounts to the sum of Seventeen Thousand six hundred and eighty one pounds according to the assessment returns thereof for the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty Eight being the financial year next preceding the year of the passing of this By-Law.

And Whereas it is necessary for the payment of the interest aforesaid and for the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the principal money of such loan to raise ten annual special rates in the pound upon the total value of the whole of the ratable property as hereinafter described, viz:

For the year
1860 four pence ⅞ths of a penny in the pound.
1861 " " " "
1862 " " " "
1863 " " " "
1864 " " " "
1865 " " " "
1866 " " " "
1867 " " " "
1868 " " " "

over and above and in addition to all other rates and assessments imposed, for the payment of the said interest and for the creation of a sinking fund, for the payment of the principal money of the said debentures, according to the requirements of the statutes in such cases made and provided.

And Whereas this By-law has been and was approved of, by a majority of the duly qualified Municipal Electors of the said Town of Peterborough ascertained in the manner pointed out in the 192nd section of the Upper Canada Municipal Act.

Be it therefore enacted by the Town Council of the Town of Peterborough, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that for the purpose of raising the said sum of One Thousand Five Hundred Pounds for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Mayor of the said Town of Peterborough for the time being, and he is hereby authorized, and required to issue debentures upon the credit of the said Town of Peterborough in sums not less than Ten Pounds each, and bearing interest at six per cent per annum, to the extent of Two Thousand Pounds as aforesaid, to be under the common seal of the said Town, to be signed by the Mayor and countersigned by the Clerk thereof, to be made payable in ten years from and after the passing of this By-law. The interest to be payable at the office of the Town Treasurer, half yearly on the days of and respectively, in and for each of the said ten years.

And be it enacted by this By-law shall come into force and take effect on the day of A. D. 1859.

TAKE NOTICE

THAT the above is a true copy of a proposed By-law which will be taken into consideration by the Council of this Municipality after one month from the first publication in the Examiner Newspaper, the date of which first publication was on Thursday the ninth day of June, A. D. 1859, and that the votes of the electors of the said Municipality will be taken for the North Ward, in the shop of Hugh Evans, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M., James Lines Returning Officer. For the Centre Ward in the Library Rooms of Thomas Rowland, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M., Robert Reburn, Returning Officer. For the South Ward in the house or shop of Mathew Logan, on Friday the 1st day of July next at 10 o'clock, A. M., Ivan O'Meara Returning Officer. And for the East Ward, in the Town Hall, on Friday the first day of July next at 10 o'clock A. M., James Edwards Returning Officer.

CONFESSIONS of a CONCEITED MAN.

BEING THE SUBSTANCE OF WHAT SOME YOUNG MEN THINK, BUT NEVER SAY.

CHAPTER I.

When I was a boy, the schoolmaster succeeded in impressing upon my mind the truth of that sonorous saying—"If a man thinks nothing of himself, no one will think anything of him." The pedagogue believed it himself, and his daily deportment was based upon it. Whether I learned anything else of him I cannot now say; but I am sure I learned to set a high value upon myself.

At the age of eighteen, I found myself in the service of an eminent merchant in Boston, in the capacity of assistant book-keeper, on the paltry salary of four hundred dollars a year. I was worth more—I was sure of it. But perhaps my employer had not yet come to a knowledge of the treasure he possessed in me, and I wisely determined to wait till I had a better opportunity to distinguish myself.

Certainly I took a great deal of pride in discharging the duties of my position. I labored assiduously to please both the merchant and the bookkeeper, and they seemed to regard me with satisfaction; but I resolved to make myself so necessary that the business could not be carried on without me.

Whether my imagination was more lively than my reason, or not, I do not know; but certainly at the end of six months I made up my mind that Mr. Bancroft could not possibly continue in business a single month without me. As to my superior, he would be perfectly powerless if I should leave. In fact, I "conceited" that I was in reality the bookkeeper of the concern, though he received the salary and did all the dictating.

I was an ambitious young man. I built a great many very pretty castles in the air; among them the idea of marrying my employers beautiful daughter was not the least attractive. She was a splendid girl—people called her the belle of Boston—and what to me was just as insinuating she was an only child, and consequently the heiress of all Mr. Bancroft's reputed wealth.

I never was one of that sort who wistfully dream over fine things, without making an attempt to attain them. That stale old maxim to the effect that "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," was uppermost in my mind. I had come to the conclusion that Rosabel Bancroft should have the supreme felicity of becoming my household deity.

[illegible] had never seen the peerless maiden, save on occasions when I had called at the house in the capacity of an errand boy—for the key of the safe, to get Mr. Bancroft to sign a check, or something of that sort.—She was a proud beauty, and had never even taken the pains to look at me. "Ah, my fine lady," thought I "when we are married, I will tell you what is what!"

Certainly I would! And as for marrying her, why, that was a settled fact in my mind—I had resolved to do the deed.

I flattered myself that I was a decidedly good-looking fellow, and a great many young men cherish this idea in these progressive times. My looking glass had told me I was handsome, and there was no going behind its impressive declaration. But I was aware that my beauty needed a little cultivation, and accordingly I applied to Bogle for some of the compounds," and in a few weeks, I had the satisfaction of contemplating the addition of a downy mustache upon my well-turned upper lip. I took a great deal of pains of this beautifier of my physiognomy, and felt perfectly sure that the charming Rosabel would be unable to resist my killing attractions.

There was to be a grand ball at Union Hall, and I heard that my divinity was to form one of the revellers. I will not trouble the reader with a relation of the difficulties that beset me in procuring a ticket—for the affair was intended solely for the "Upper ten;" but I got one, though it cost me the neighborhood of twenty-five dollars, to say nothing of twenty-five more expended in a fancy vest, cravat, and other little amiabilities.

When I was dressed for the occasion, the effect was perfectly stunning. Rosabel was certainly a goner!

My entree into the drawing room seemed to create a profound sensation. All the gentlemen stared at me, and I felt assured of being the lion of the evening. It was plain that my "personal" had created a furor among the aristocratic dandies; but I tried to treat them with all respect and politeness. It is true I saw some of them turn up their noses at me; and all evinced a disposition to avoid me. But I attributed all these unmannerly symptoms to the envy which my superior personal attractions had roused in their narrow minds. I did not resent their ill nature—I could afford to be magnanimous.

I walked like a king through the sumptuous apartments, I always prided myself on my gait. More than once when I have been leisurely promenading Washington Street, I have felt sure that all the ladies had singled me out for especial admiration.

There was something about my style of walking, and I did not blame the dear creatures for sighing when I passed them. It was a great pity that, in the illiberality of our laws, only one lady could ever have the satisfaction of calling me her husband. I am naturally of a sympathetic temperament and I assure the reader that it deeply grieved me to think of the number of fair, promising ladies who would be disappointed in winning my affections. I could not have them all, and from the bottom of my heart I pitied those who were doomed to be disappointed.

Rosabel Bancroft was destined to be my wife. I had deliberately made up my mind and though I thought, in consideration of my condescension in choosing her from the thousands who would have rejoiced to win me, she ought to meet me half way. But I was not ungenerous, and in deference to the feelings of the latter, I resolutely commenced to do all the [illegible] agent.

I succeeded in getting an introduction to her, and she consented to dance with me. I was not much elated; I regarded my progress as a matter of course. During the quadrille, I did the agreeable to my own satisfaction, and though the impression was not as marked and decided as I had expected, I was assured that every thing was going on well.

"Procrastination is the thief of time," said somebody I don't remember whether it was Plato or Diogenes. When the dance was ended, and I had conducted her to the drawing room, I made bold to express my admiration of her beauty and grace. She blushed, smiled, and looked confused. Poor thing! how could she help it?

Just then a dandy spoke a word to her, and then retreated. I was not to be balked, and with all the eloquence I possessed—and I would just hint that Demosthenes, Cicero, or Daniel Webster could'nt hold a candle to me in making a speech—I popped the question!

It was handsomely done, and Rosabel was taken all aback. I expected all this—I knew all about making love—Ovid could not tell me anything about it. Girls, at this momentous crisis, do not always mean half they say; and I was prepared to hear her declare it was rather sudden, that she must ask papa about it, and all that sort of thing.

But my ardent confession seemed to throw her into a perspiration—if I may so unpoetically express the confusion which my declaration produced.

"You impudent puppy!" exclaimed she, her pretty cheek red with anger; "so you are one of my father's clerks, and have the presumption to ask me to dance with you, and then to offer me such an indignity!—Leave my presence, sir, this instant, or I will ask my friends to kick you away!"

Whew! I did feel sheepish for a moment but then, poor thing, she did not know her own mind. Some of these envious noodles had been exciting her prejudices against me That dandy had told her I was her father's clerk, before I had an opportunity to weave my spell upon her.

Comforting myself with the assurance that there were thousands of heiresses who were more discriminating than she, I whistled an air, and ambled away from her. If there is any person on the face of the earth whom I pity more than another, it is he or she who wilfully throws away a good opportunity.

Poor Rosabel! I pitied her! I believe I was unselfish enough to deplore her misfortune more actually than I did my own. I had lost nothing that might not be regained; she had cast away one of the most brilliant opportunities that ever dawned upon the destiny of a woman.

[illegible] me best, of possessing firmness in every remarkable degree; and it was melancholy to think she had cast me off forever, for I am sure, if she had fallen upon her knees and begged and pleaded, I should have been as firm as a rock. Those insulting, unlady-like words, had "fixed her flint"—to use a rather homtry phrase, which I believe did not originate either with Addison or Macaulay.

I did not dance any more that evening. I found I had fallen among fools, who could not appreciate me. And strange as it may seem to the unphilosophical reader, the fact did not in the least disturbed my natural equanimity. Why should it? Did not Socrates express the same coldness at the hands of the fickle Athenians, who put him to death by mixing poison with his "sherry cobber"? Why should I expect a better than those whose misfortune it is to be superior to the masses around them?

I left the hall regretting only that the eighth part of my year's salary had been wasted in the adventure.

When I went to the counting room next morning Mr. Bancroft summoned me to his private office.

"You are a fool, young man!" said he, and his face was flushed with anger.

O the ingratitude of the world! This was a pretty return for the distinguished honor I had intended for his daughter, and which only her own wilfulness had prevented her from receiving at my hands.

If you ever presume to speak to my daughter again, under any circumstance, I will immediately discharge you from my service,' continued he, with the utmost coolness.

"Nonsense!" thought I—and I beg the reader will not suppose I uttered this unseemingly expression—"you won't do any thing of the kind. You know your own interest too well."

Discharge me! I should have liked to see him do it. I believe I should actually have gone, if he had said the word, and left him to take care of his business as best he might! If he had got me mad, I should just as lief seen him fail as not—it is my temperament. To a friend I am a friend; to a foe, a foe of the most determined sort.

But he knew better than to provoke me too far. Bancroft was a shrewd man. He knew just how far I would have permitted him to go on, in defence to the dignity of his position, and he did not exceed that limit It was a lucky thing for him that he did not. Disaster, mercantile ruin, would have been the inevitable consequences of such an imprudent act!

I regret that my space does not permit me to give the reader the details of my exploits in the arena of Cupid for the succeeding six months. They were rich and varied; but I am happy to consolo my friends and admirers with the assurance that I am at present engaged in writing out the history of the whole period, which in due time will appear, complete in seven volumes, with portraits and illustrations.

From the events of this campaign I deduce the melancholy conclusion that the fair sex are sadly wanting in good taste and nice discrimination. The fact that I am still a bachelor is a sad commentary on the truth. The ladies" are not what they are cracked up to be"—to use a rather indelegant expression, which I think was original with Harry, the poet.

Disappointed of my matrimonial hopes I determined to make commerce the study of my life. I had about made up my mind to offer my hand and fortune to Rothschild—not that the offer to become his partner is important, if I never take stock in [illegible] of that for their friends. Whatever they do do for one is done with careful explanations of how kind it is.

There's many a person who would shudder at robing a man, or at desecrating a grave-yard, who will rob God, or desecrate his Sabbath.

There's many a person who will watch lest his child play upon the Sabbath hours, who will yet go and aid a whole school of children to do what helps to fasten the doom of Sabbath labor upon the working man.

There's many a man as just as Aristides to all beyond his own family circle, but who is more unjust than the veriest tyrant to all within.

There's many a woman who if one of her fellow-creatures were to give favors to her child would never require him ill, who will yet encourage that child to take God's favors to disobey and abuse him with.

There's many a person that reads, meditates, and sings most devoutly, by the hour together, who yet hugs the abject snake of selfishness and the cruel asp of hatred in constant embrace.

There's many a person who tries to be religious, but never tries to be noble minded, tolerant, polite, agreeable and always clean from head to foot.

There's many a person who aims to be ever true but who forgets to be always kind.

Many a man whose honor is large affairs is worthy of praise, who in the small unexpected matters of each day has no honor at all.

The trouble is people will cheat themselves into feeling that God cares only for important and noticeable acts. They have a very vivid conception of how that All-seeing eye would flame upon them were they in the act of some outrageous sin; but that it actually is just as attentively upon every look and word that passes between man wife, parent and child, brother and sister, friend and friend—that it watches narrowly hour do every little act, and what motive prompted this deed, or what remark this—is the thing about which two thirds of Christians even are infidels. But does not He, who numbers the very hairs of our head, observe each thought and motive of our hearts? Yes, surely. Remember, then, to be always right and noble in the little things, and you will never go wrong in the greater. The man or woman who runs a line of principle through that part of life which is least in dignity and importance, will be in no danger of being outwitted [illegible] in the higher complications of mercantile affairs, and to become a partner of his might involve me in some future sacrifices, which it might not be pleasant to make.

I thought it best, on the whole, to retain my present situation. But the salary was too small. I must wait upon Bancroft, and consent to remain in his service, if he would add a hundred dollars to my pay. Of course he would not be so impudent as to run the risk of failure and utter ruin for so trifling a matter as that.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Bancroft," said I, in my blandest tones, —for even a highway robber is polite nowadays when he blows a man's brains out—" but I have taken the liberty to wait upon you for the purpose of asking you to advance my salary from four to five hundred dollars."

"Go to the devil!" said he rudely.

It is astonishing how some folks will even kick an angel out of their presence.—Poor Bancroft! he "stood in his own light' —to borrow from Carlyle or Mephistophiles I forgot which.

"You are dear help at two hundred a year; I don't want you any longer at any price," continued Bancroft.

"There's stupidity for you!" thought I. My blood was up, and I determined to leave him, let the consequences be what they might.

I did leave him, assured that the mercantile world would be startled to its centre by a crash, in a very short time. The concern has not broke down yet, but there is a moral certainty that it must soon "go by the board,"—to quote from Captain Cook, or Sir John Franklin, it is not very material which.

I had not been out of business a week before I discovered that literature was the proper sphere for me. I think to bring about a revolution in the world of letters, by introducing an entirely new style of composition, adapted both to poetry and prose. I have several works under way including a complete History to the Musquito Kingdom, Annals of Hull, and a poem in two hundred and seventy-six cantos, on the Want of Appreciation and Correct Taste in the Female Sex,—all of which will appear as soon as written and published.

SMALL MORALITIES.

There's many a man who would not all at once rob his fellow of all that he owns, yet would remorselessly do it by sixpences and shillings.

There's many a woman who would not cut her neighbor's flesh, who will yet stab her to the heart by a tongue thrust at her character.

[illegible] words, cheat and deceive any woman, who will yet do so most cruelly, most fatally, by manner, look and act.

And there's many a woman who will do the same.

There's many a person who will not illtreat strangers or visitors, who will neglect, and in ten thousand ways impose upon, those that love him—the more sure he is of that love the more bold are his impositions.—Execrable!

There's many a person who does all larger things upon principle, but goes alone by impulse in the smaller [which are often the more important] matters of life.

There's many a person who wouldn't for anything neglect scripture reading, prayer, church-going, or even alms-giving, who will whine, and fret, and growl, all day long rendering everybody about them uncomfortable.

There are many persons who will talk with tears in their eyes of the love of God who never deny themselves for pure, unreflecting love of their enemies, or hardly for their friends. Whatever they do do for one is done with careful explanations of how kind it is.

There's many a person who would shudder at robing a man, or at desecrating a grave-yard, who will rob God, or desecrate his Sabbath.

There's many a person who will watch lest his child play upon the Sabbath hours, who will yet go and aid a whole school of children to do what helps to fasten the doom of Sabbath labor upon the working man.

There's many a man as just as Aristides to all beyond his own family circle, but who is more unjust than the veriest tyrant to all within.

There's many a woman who if one of her fellow-creatures were to give favors to her child would never require him ill, who will yet encourage that child to take God's favors to disobey and abuse him with.

There's many a person who tries to be religious, but never tries to be noble minded, tolerant, polite, agreeable and always clean from head to foot.

There's many a person who aims to be ever true but who forgets to be always kind.

Many a man whose honor is large affairs is worthy of praise, who in the small unexpected matters of each day has no honor at all.

The trouble is people will cheat themselves into feeling that God cares only for important and noticeable acts. Do everything as if you saw who sees you. You'll soon see Him. Prepare!

A Sharp Blade.

The following dialogue took place on the Ohio Railroad:—

"Halloo, stranger, you appear to be travelling?"

"Yes, I always travel when I'm on a journey.'

"I think I have seen you somewhere?'

"Very like. I've often been there."

"Might'nt your name be Smith?"

"Well it might—if it wasn't something else!

"Have you been long in these parts?"

"Never longer than at present—five feet nine."

"Do you calculate to remain here some time?"

"Well I guess I'll stay till I'm ready to leave!"

"I reckon you were born in New England?"

"Well my native place was either there or somewhere else."

"You travel as if money were plenty with you."

"Well I might have more and be richer."

"Have you anything new?"

"Yes I bought a whetstone this morning."

"I thought so; you're the sharpest blade I ever saw on this road."

For the Examiner.

DISSOLUTION OF THE UNION.

AN ESSAY—BY "NESTOR."

MR. EDITOR,—It is well known throughout the country, that the present system of government cannot be long tolerated. If any are ignorant of this circumstance, it is because they purposely exclude the light from themselves. The more people read and think and reason on the subject, the more this opinion forces itself upon them. People who have zealously defended the government during the last few years are now completely shocked at the enormity of ministerial guilt. Some men excuse the errors of government on very curious grounds. They think, it is beyond a man's power to resist such temptations, as are offered to members of Parliament. They think that men of this generation are more like Adam receiving the apple from Eve, than like Christ refusing to accept all the kingdoms of the earth from the Devil. That this is true there can be little doubt nevertheless a better government, than our present do not easily be found. Men who principled and corrupt, console themselves by thinking we cannot find a better one.—But these men are trying to cast an independent reproach on the country. Honest men can be found. But the rule in these times, is to choose dishonest men to govern the country. The most clever rogue is almost sure to get to Parliament. He that has a big purse and spends his money liberally, at an election, has a good chance to be successful. Some people consider this a patriotic man. But they fail to perceive that he is likely to take ten times as much from them thereafter as a remuneration for his great liberality towards them. They do as Esau did. They sell their "birthright for a mess of pottage." Like the Bee in the fable they think of nothing, but present gratification.

Let us suppose a town is engaged in some public work. It is in great need of a few thousand pounds to complete the undertaking. Some person procures the money on advantageous terms. Some time afterwards a man is to be chosen to represent the county, in Parliament. The man who procured the money offers himself as a candidate. And he receives the support of the town, in return for his former service. It is no matter whether he is an honest man or a rogue, whether he is a wise man or a fool. Many a member of the Legislative Assembly owes his seat to such an act as, I have just described. This is the reason that we are governed by so many rogues and fools. People who vote for such men do not know how to appreciate the rights of freemen. Like a child that cannot perceive more value in a diamond, than in a piece of ivory, these men cannot distinguish liberty from oppression. Certain causes produce certain effects. And certain practices among the people brings certain calamities on the nation.

People pay too little attention to the connection that exists between causes and effects. If a man loves pleasure, lives above his income, and his property is sold to satisfy the claims of his creditors, any person can see the connection of cause and effect in this case; and the love of ease and pleasure causes him to live above his income. Thus the effect of one cause, is sometimes the cause of another effect. If a man leaps off a platform into a river or lake and is drowned it is easy for any person to see the connection between the cause and the effect. He is leaping into the water is the cause; and his being drowned is the effect. But why did he leap into the water? Because he was insane. But why did he become insane? Because he was intemperate in the use of spirituous liquors. But why did he use intoxicating liquors? Because he associated with drunken companions. Then because he associated with drunkards, he became a drunkard, and through intemperance he became mad, and because he was mad, he leaped into the water, and became so leaped into the water he was drowned. Every cause produces its effect, and that effect is generally the cause of another effect. This rule holds good with regard to nations. Like an individual, a nation may go, step by step, to destruction. The conduct of our Government has a demoralizing effect on the country. By lowering the morals of the country the ignorance of the people increases. Ignorance produces crime, and crime produces misery. As sure as the man who joined the society of drunkards, had encreased a hundred ounces, the company has encreased a number of thirsty and unhappy, But if the man had refrained when he was a drunkard, it does not follow from this reasoning that he would have drowned himself; and if this country were governed by wise men, who would correct the abuses with which it is distracted, it's downward course to destruction might be arrested.

Getting a sum of money for a town, or county does not entitle a man to Parliamentary honor. A man who is utterly destitute of honesty and virtue can do this. Nor does this require a man to be endowed with any extraordinary talents. It is no proof that he is worthy of a seat in Parliament. If he is entitled to any remuneration, it should be given in some other way. This act does not qualify a man to be a member of parliament.—Neither does it disqualify him. His claims should rest entirely on other grounds than this. Virtue and talents should decide his claim. If public men relied more on these two qualities, and less on the influence of their wealth, and their connections, it is certain that the country would be much better governed than it is at present. In these times men rely mostly on their position in society, and their connections, and their wealth, for preferment. But they should be taught to rely entirely on talents and honesty. They use the bait at which they know the fish will bite. And this is money.

But if the fish refused to bite at this bait they would be compelled to use some other kind. Then they would have to put talents and virtue on the hook, if they expected to be successful in the struggle. And I am sure a great number would be compelled to quit fishing from want of suitable baits.—These last few years, getting into parliament and joining the Lower Canadians, has been a sure way for any Upper Canadian to make a splendid fortune. And surely such a prize as this is sufficient to stifle a great many conscientious convictions. Good legislation cannot be expected from men who obtained their seats in parliament, by means of bribery and corruption. It is an easy way for traitors to enrich themselves. This door ought to be shut. Place it beyond the power of any set of men to satisfy their avarice at the expense of their country. If the Union were dissolved these men would have a small share of power. "The rock of" their "last hope" would "be shivered." "And its fragments" would sink "in the wave."

They would be delivered up to suffer all the pangs of a political death. And they would sink into shades of eternal disgrace, "unwept, unhonoured and unsung."

A dissolution of the Union is the only way in which the present evils can be overcome. That evils of no common magnitude do exist cannot be reasonably denied. Canadians are continually aiming at the destruction of their laws, and their religion, and their institutions. The Lower Canadian members are nearly unanimous in their political opinions. And a small body of the Upper Canadians who are more avaricious than patriotic, is combined with the Lower Canadians. These unprincipled men perceived that the Lower Canadians were willing to give them a very great remuneration for their services. This combination places the greatest share of power in the hands of Lower Canada. The Lower Canadians are completely governed by their Clergy. The will of the Clergy is the standard by which they try every measure. Thus they consider the robbery of Upper Canada a laudable object. And their Upper Canadian allies seem to feel no remorse for the calamities of their own section of the country. But the Lower Canadans know that this power must soon pass out of their hands. This makes them careful to use it in a beneficial manner. It is like a borrowed horse, which is never permitted to go idle. If they were sure that it would remain with them always, perhaps they would use it less rigorously than they do. But the certainty of loosing it makes them take every advantage that it affords them while it remains in their possession. They do not care how improperly they use it for they look on it as a thing that they cannot long enjoy. They are like a man who holds a property by some false or frivolous claim. He pays no attention to its improvement, for he knows, it will soon go out of his possession. His sole aim is to convert as much as he can to his own use.

The Government have lost all sense of shame. They are willing to suffer any amount of reproach for the sake of plunder. They have abandoned the hope of ever becoming popular, but they have not abandoned the hope of becoming rich. Indeed the hope of becoming rich, according to their present mode, and of becoming popular are quite inconsistant with each other, and the sacrificed popularity to wealth.—Their motto seems to be,

"The man who suffers, loudly may complain;
And rage he may, but he shall rage in vain."

Neither Upper Canada, nor Lower Canada is fully satisfied with the effects of the Union. Lower Canada is suffering from imaginary wrongs. Upper Canada is suffering from real grievances. Lower Canada is conscious of the wrongs it has inflicted on Upper Canada, and it drought a day of retribution. The manner in which they contend against "Representation according to Population," is a strong proof of their fear.

Upper Canada is determined to free itself from the control of Lower Canada. The Lower Canadians are in favor of a Federal Union of the British American provinces. They think this would help to shield them from the wrath to come. Hitherto Upper Canada considered "Representation according to Population" its only safeguard, but the people are beginning to see that a dissolution of the Union is the only way in which their rights can be secured. Since both provinces are anxious for a change in the government of the country, it is plain that neither is satisfied with the present system of legislation. No doubt, the Lower Canadians would be well satisfied with the present Government, if they were not afraid that they are abusing up much the [illegible] nation, against the day of wrath. Though perhaps, they would wish to see a more settled state of things, yet they cannot forbear to plunder, while they have the opportunity. I must admit, there is a little temptation in this, and the Government have frequently, shown themselves altogether incapable of resisting temptations.—Hence no person need wonder at their conduct.

Much inquiry arises from members legislating on questions, which they do not understand. And which they do not try to understand. Everything which the Upper Canadians demand, is opposed by the Lower Canadians. Whenever they demur, that a bill is brought in by an Upper Canadian they make it out as an object of their special hatred. It has the same effect on the bill that the sentence of "guilty" has on a prisoner. Measures which are very popular in Upper Canada, are often defeated by the interference of Lower Canada. How can a Government in which these wrongs are perpetrated, satisfy the Upper Canadians? It is plain to see that it is impossible for the country to be well governed, while the Union exists.

I am sure every patriot will, emphatically condemn the manner in which the Government acted, with regard to the Seigneurial lands in Lower Canada. The manner in which they acted is censurable in two respects. The bill is an example of unparalleled injustice to Upper Canada.

First the LowerCanadian farmers receive a monstrous bribe. They get free farms at the expense of Upper Canada. Can they ever cease to support a Government, that conferred so great a favour upon them?—The redemption of the Seigneurial lands must be a very difficult thing when such extensive bribery as this is necessary to accomplish it.

Much has been said about assimilating the laws of the two provinces. This is a humbug. Would we consent to have our laws assimilated to the laws of Lower Canada? Or would the Lower Canadians wish to assimilate their laws to ours? They say that if any alteration is made, it must be in the Laws of Upper Canada, for that their law is founded on the Roman law which is the most barefaced that was ever framed by man. And it would be complete tyranny to alter the laws of either province contrary to the wishes of the people. Or if the Union continues will Upper Canada have to yield this point to Lower Canada, as usual. So far as the Union had this object in view it has proved a complete failure. The Union is only a name, the object of that name is to rule Upper Canada. There is another advantage which the country would derive from a dissolution of the Union.—New parliament buildings would not be required. This would save the country considerable at the present time. Upper Canada has a parliament house in Toronto. And it would not cost the Lower Canadians much to build a parliament house for themselves, because they would have to provide money for themselves, and they would strive to be economical. It is not customary for Britons to admit themselves inferior to any race of people. And we will not consent to be governed by the Lower Canadians. I would just remind the oppressors of Upper Canada that it would be wiser for them to "Spare us the inexpiable wrong, the unutterable shame

That turns the coward's heart to steel, the sluggards blood to flame
Lest when our latest hope has fled, ye taste of our despair,
And learn by proof, in some wild hour, how much the wretched dare."

The Union should be dissolved, and let each province manage its own affairs. Extravagance and folly in robbing us, of what the necessary expenses of the country could spare, and it is time to save the few remnens of wealth we still possess.

Singular case of Hydrophobia.

DISCOVERY OF A PREVENTIVE.

A remarkable case of hydrophobia came to our knowledge a few days ago, and may be of interest, inasmuch as it suggests the possibility of a cure. Almost twenty years ago a man named Clarke, who resided in Jamestown, Ky., a little town about three miles from this city, was bitten by a dog which proved to be rabid, and in a short time afterwards was taken with the most violent symptoms of that disease. The malady, which, as well known, sometimes exists in the system for a number of years, one or two cases are known of twenty years' standing—before it makes its appearance in all its virulence, did not, in the instance, prove immediately fatal, and by the operations of his physicians and friends the spasms were, for a short time allayed, and the patient regained a good degree of health. A few days, however, only elapsed when he again perceived a recurrence of his dispensation to bite and snap, together with the hatred of water and a spasmodic contraction of the throat by which the disease is characterised, and he had a severe and much more violent attack than the first, during which even the physicians who attended him gave up the case as hopeless, and left him to die.

By some means, however, this fact came to the knowledge of some person who had heard—from what source we cannot tell—that a medicine known in Botanic Physicians as the Third Preparation had been found benefic huge quantity of frothy mucus, and from that moment the spasms ceased, and there was also a relief from other more prominent symptoms of the disease. He gradually grew better as this treatment was continued and at length became able to attend to his duties, which he has done with but slight intermissions ever since.

Almost every day—although, we believe he has not been confined to his bed—there has been a recurrence of the disease, which however, has been promptly checked by the same means which brought about such a miraculous change in the first instance. He now attends to his business daily, and when this contraction of the throat makes its appearance he dosses himself largely with the preparation, which he keeps continually about him, and immediately upon this discharge from his stomach he becomes well.

Among the numerous cases of this terrible disease which occur every season in large cities where no prospect is left for the escape of the sufferer from what is more to be feared than death itself, if one could be thus saved all the writhing agony and pain of even one day which is spent at the mercy of those spasms, which are its peculiarity, our purpose in making this publication will have been attained.

This story, as we have related it, is strictly true in every particular, and, as the medicine may be obtained at almost any drug store in the country, its use may prevent a great deal of suffering, and probably save many a life. At all events the case is worthy of note, as showing that although the virus may not be entirely eradicated from the system, it at least may be controlled in its effects.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

SHIPMENTS OF GOLD—EXPEDITION TO QUEEN CHARLOTTE'S ISLAND.

The news from British Columbia is to May 14. The Victoria Gazette has the following:—

"Through the principals at Wells, Fargo & Co.'s and Freeman & Co.'s, I have been shown the statement of gold dust shipped by their respective houses to San Francisco from April 11 to May 10, inclusive—30 days—($195,000) and from these correct figures I shall make a showing that the most liberal denouncer of these colonies must admit to be astonishing; while the unprejudiced, whether here or elsewhere, cannot fail to see that the yield of gold per man is larger in British Columbia, even now while the country is scarcely prospected, than in California, where there are good roads, and where capital is abundant and every facility for working the mines exist.

"The number of miners in British Columbia actually at work is 3,000 men; many good judges, however, say there are not more than 2,000 working steadily. The $195,000 shipped as above would give as the result for each of the 3,000 men, $2 16¾ per day.

"The Victoria House of Assembly having grumbled at the proposed erection by Gov. Douglas (without previous consultation with it) of certain new public buildings addressed him on the subject. The Governor replies:—"I did not think it necessary to consult the House concerning the erection of those buildings, for the reason that the House was not called upon to defray their cost, and because the House has, on all occasions, declined to take any responsibility in such purely Executive matters, or "with one exception to provide funds for any Colonial improvement whatever."

"The first church erected in British Columbia was opened 8th May, at the new town of Langley. The sermon was preached by the Rector of the church, the Rev. [illegible], says the British Colonist, in order to organize an expedition to Queen Charlotte's Island for the purpose of exploring that island for gold and other minerals. Alfred Waddington, Esq., was called to the chair, and W. S. Fitch, Esq., appointed Secretary. The chairman in his usual felicitous style, explained at some length the object of the meeting. Speeches were made by Messrs. Hicks, Lang, and Minor, who have been in the Islands; and by Messrs. Bayley, Hatch and others, who were favourable to the object. All agreed that there was gold there—and that an expedition was desirable. A committee of seven were named to carry out the objects of the meeting.

"Victoria is daily assuming the appearance of a quiet country village. Business is not worth mentioning. More or fewer mechanics, however, find employment in erecting the various improvements being made by government, the Hudson's Bay Company, &c. A public sale took place, a few days since, of some of the most valuable real estates in town. Very few, if any, were bought by Americans.

"It is quite probable that the supplies for the American boundary commissioners will be drawn from some point on the Sound and packed across the mountains to the Okanagon country, where they will meet the commission; at least, this plan is proposed by the military men at head quarters. Captains Archer and Fletcher of Fort Simcoe, it is stated, have been ordered, with their companies, to take up the line of march for that region, and are expected to reach there about the 1st June. They take only thirty days supplies."

THE LATE KING OF NAPLES.

We have not space, nor indeed, inclination, to mention here even the chief events of his reign. The single incident of 1848 is sufficient to show what the man was.—In that year, and when the revolutionary spirit had penetrated to Naples, there was no man in the Neapolitan dominions so eager for Constitutional Government as the King. Let him but have Constitutional Ministers—let him but have the Constitution for which he longed more ardently than the most enlightened of his subjects, and he would be content. His was no cold nor formal adhesion to the new order of things. He vowed, he protested, he called God to witness his sincerity, he invoked the direst punishments here and hereafter to fall upon his head if he did not abide by his pledged word. A looker-on who had known the windings of that false and treacherous heart might perhaps have said—but the times were full of emotion. The credulity of the people was equal to the hypocrisy of the King—it was infinite.—All this time he was plotting their ruin and death. He waited for the occasion, and the occasion came. It was on a fine day in May that King Ferdinand found that the water had begun to turn in his direction. He took advantage of the happy moment, and blew his subjects to atoms with all the dire ammunition of shot and shell—of bayonet and sword. Nor was this all. While the streets were yet red with blood the King renewed his oath in terms which one now remembers with a shudder—saying that the man is dead—to allay suspicion and alarm. Thus he was able to lurk his chief opponents while his grasp, and in due time to consign them to dungeons and misery indescribable. When Mr. Gladstone was in Naples, the number of the political prisoners in the kingdom was estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000 sufferers. It seems incredible that such things should have happened in our times, but the truth must be told. Superstition is the only explanation we can offer of the fact that a man could do such wickedness and endure the burden of life himself.—King Ferdinand was sunk in the most abject superstition, and so it may be that his last moments were soothed by some priestly juggle, and that he passed away without feeling that extremity of misery which he had inflicted upon thousands and thousands of his fellow-creatures. The prevailing opinion in Naples seems to be, that if the European system were to be left undisturbed the inhabitants of the Two Sicilies would not gain much by the exchange of the son for the father. It may, however be that are long we shall publish the announcement that the dead system has perished with the dead King. He caused many tears to flow during his life, few will be shed for his death.

"Methinks this monarch doth protest too much."

The War News,

The war news received during the last week is very important. By the steamer "Anglo-Saxon" we have reports of a battle taking place, resulting in a loss to the Austrians of 20,000 men, and to the French of 12,000. The reports are very conflicting, both parties claiming the victory. That a great battle had taken place admits of no doubt; and that the French remain masters of the field, would appear to be correct. The allies, under a pretended attack of the extreme left of the Austrian line, threw an immense force back on the retreating Austrians, crossed the Ticino near Buffalora, and facing the enemy, defeated them at Magenta, a town of about 6,000 inhabitants, which lies between the Ticino and Milan.

By the arrival of the Persia we have four days later advices. The report of the battle of Magenta is confirmed. She also brings reports of other engagements having been fought. The Austrians were driven from Melegano, with a loss of 1,200 taken prisoners. Milan had been evacuated by the Austrians, and the Allies had entered. They were welcomed by the inhabitants, who presented them a cockade, tricoloured, Victor Emmanuel, King. Those who have faith in the promise of Louis Napoleon to liberate Italy, will rejoice at this news. One or two more such successes by the Allies, and Italy may be free.

The "Persia" also brings important news concerning the British Parliament.—Lord Derby's Government had been defeated in the House of Commons, by a majority of 13.

Rev. Wm. Scott.—This gentleman, who has filled the charge of the Wesleyan Church for the last two years, has been stationed at Toronto by the Conference. Mr. Scott during his residence here has earned for himself the kind regards of this community in bringing about that harmony between the different denominations of Christians, so much needed when he was first stationed here. Mr. Scott leaves many warm friends in Peterboro' who will long remember his kind services.

Mr. Lanton, a gentleman well known to many of our residents, has been appointed to fill the place of Mr. Scott.

Welcome News—Late English papers state that Sir E. Grogan, one of the members for the City of Dublin, is likely to succeed the present incumbent, Sir F. Head, in the Governor-Generalship of Canada. So the country is likely to get rid of its juggling, partizan Governor!—What will become of the Cartier ministry now?

Sir Allan McNabb.—This gentleman, since his electioneering career in Brighton, has been the subject of many a good joke by the English press. Here is the latest:

Missing.—A Canadian gentleman, of full and plethoric habit, who was last week purple with rage, and in a high condition of excitement, brandishing his fists at a Brighton mob. When last heard of he was in a state of exhaustion, in electioneering Sangrados of Brighton. His luggage, supposed to contain a box of sovereigns, is labelled, "Sir A. M'N B." If this should meet his eye, he is entreated to return to his friends and connections in Canada, by whom he will be cheerfully received, and all his recent wanderings overlooked.—Town Talk.

Correction.—In our report of the Town Council proceedings of the 6th inst., we unintentionally inserted the name of James for that of John Wilson, who was prepared to give up his Tavern license.

The Court House Hill.—The ground in front of the Court House has been very much improved lately. A small amount more would be sufficient to make it a splendid public park. The Town Council have displayed their wish to carry through the work begun; and it is to be hoped the Council will [illegible]

COUNTIES' COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 21st June, 1859.

Council met.

16 present—W. S. Conger, Warden, and Messrs. Baily, Clark, Coughlan, Dean, Eyers, Garbutt, Houran, Ingram, Lang, McHugh, Mathewson, Morison, Rodgers, White and Wigmore.

6 absent—Messrs. Cottingham, Dunsford, Hodgson, Kempt, Naylor and McLauchlin.

Minutes of last Session read and confirmed.

The Warden addressed the Council on various subjects affecting the interests of these United Counties.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Garbutt, that the Warden's Address be submitted to a committee, composed of Messrs. Dean, McHugh, Morison, Lang, Rodgers, and the mover, to report thereon.—Carried.

On the motion of Mr. Eyers the petition of John Perrin and 49 others was referred to Committee on Petitions.

Moved by Mr. Lang, seconded by Mr. Ingram, that Messrs. Rodgers, White and Kempt, be a committee to examine, qualify, and equalize the Assessment Rolls of 1858, and report to this Council at as early a period as possible.

The Council then adjourned.

We are unable to find space for the Warden's Address in this issue, it will appear in our next.

No business of importance was transacted yesterday. The most of the day was consumed by the different committees.

TOWN COUNCIL.

Monday, June 20, 1859.

Council met, present the Mayor, Messrs. Conger, Henthorn, White, Fowlis, Read, Toole, Eastland, Bradfield, Morrow, Hogan and Burnham.

Minutes of former meeting read and approved.

A petition from John Lane, asking compensation for a part of his crop destroyed by the straightening of the road at his place, was referred to committee on Streets and Bridges.

A communication from Messrs. Read and Bradfield, asking the Council to appoint two members of the Council on the committee of Streets and Bridges in their stead, or one member in place of Mr. Henthorn, was read and received.

A petition from M. Martyn and others, asking for repairs on London Street, East of Water Street, and the bridge across the Mill Race, was read and referred to committee on Streets and Bridges.

Three accounts from H. Crone, for work on streets, were referred to committee on Streets and Bridges.

An order from Mr. Henthorn in favor of John Sullivan, for six dollars, was referred to committee on Streets and Bridges.

A report from the special committee appointed to enquire into the complaints which have been urged against the Market By-law, Written was received and adopted.

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. Burnham,—That hereafter the Council will not indemnify the Street & Bridge committee, for any sums they may expend beyond the sum appropriated, and that the name of Mr. Morrow be added to that committee.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. Fowlis,—That it would greatly conduce to the good appearance of the Town, and the preservation of the trees, were the grounds in front of the Court House levelled and fenced. That as the Counties Council have a large interest in the improvement of these grounds, this Council would suggest that the work should be done at the joint expense of the Town and Counties, and this Council pledges itself to furnish such portion of the means as may be agreed upon by the Reeves of this Council.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Read, seconded by Mr. Fowlis,—That it be an instruction to the Reeves from this Council, that they use their best exertions to get a further appropriation for the Bridge to be erected at the North limit of the Town.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Fowlis,—That the sum of £250 be granted to assist in the construction of the Bridge on the boundary line between Peterboro' and Smith, and Otonabee and Douro.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. Henthorn, seconded by Mr. Burnham,—That the nine hundred pounds due by Mr. John Fowler to this Council, being the first half years interest due on the stock of £3000, towards the completion of the Millbrook Branch of Railroad to this Town, be placed to the last Financial report of this Council, as an asset of this Municipality.—Lost.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Fowlis,—That Mr. Andrew Catbcart, be appointed Inspector of Fire Wood, under the provision of clause 17 of the Market By-law.—Carried.

On motion of Mr. White, a By-law to amend the Market By-law, was read a first time.

On motion of Mr. White, By-law No—to amend the Market By-law, was read a second time in committee of the whole.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Fowlis,—That the matter in dispute between this Council and the representatives of the late Judge Hall, be referred to the Finance committee for their consideration, with instructions that if the difficulty can be settled amicably, to withdraw the suit.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned for two weeks.

Suicide.—On Thursday morning last a young woman named Catherine Spilling committed suicide in Toronto, by cutting her throat with a razor. She was a millwright 17 years of age, and it is supposed [illegible]

ARRIVAL OF THE 'ANGLO-SAXON'

Great Battle Fought!

AUSTRIAN LOSS, 20,000.

FRENCH LOSS, 12,000.

PARIS ILLUMINATED!

OPENING OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Quebec, June 18.

The steamship Anglo Saxon, from Liverpool on the 8th, passed Farther Point this forenoon and the news despatch was obtained.

The report that the Austrians were in retreat across the Ticino is fully confirmed.

The French crossed the Ticino at Buffalora and Turbio. Considerable fighting occurred at both places on the 4th.

A great battle had taken place at Magenta, 12 miles from Milan. Napoleon's despatches claim a decisive victory and Paris was illuminated.

General Espinasse was killed, and General Canrobert mortally wounded. Five French Marshals and Generals were wounded.

The Emperor had created Marshal Baraguay D'Hilliers Duke of Magenta, who was superseded in his command by General Forey.

Milan was insurgent, and had declared in favor of the King of Sardinia.

The Austrians had retired from Milan, but the French had not occupied it.

Rumors in Paris represented the French losses at from 9,000 to 12,000. Austrian loss, 20,000. The number of forces engaged was reported at from 150,000 to 180,000 Austrians, and from 100,000 to 130,000 French.

The Austrian accounts speak of a series of battles, with varying successes on both sides, and still undecided; on the night of the 6th great losses were sustained on both sides. The Austrians admit four Generals and five Staff-officers wounded.

It was reported that General Hess had commanded; and it was also said that Napoleon had partially commanded.

The latest rumors detract from the alleged French Victory.

It was believed that proposals for peace would be made if the French entered Milan.

GREAT BRITAIN.

On the opening of Parliament on the 7th inst., the Queen delivered her speech and laments the outbreak of war. Her Majesty did all in Her power to prevent it, and proclaims strict, impartial neutrality.—She says the navy had been increased beyond Parliamentary authority, and asks its sanction. Her Majesty recommended intercourse with Napleon; and expressed a hope that the reform question would be settled this or next session.

In the House of Commons the Liberals had moved an amendment to the Address in answer to the speech from the Throne, declaring that Ministers did not possess the confidence of Parliament. The debate was pending.

The Bombay mail of the 12th May had arrived; news unimportant. A great monetary panic prevailed.

Further by the "Anglo-Saxon."

The following is the first announcement by telegraph from Napoleon to the Empress of the great battle fought on the 4th instant:—

Novara, June 4—At 11.30 a great victory was won at the Bridge of Magenta. 5,000 prisoners taken and 15,000 of the enemy killed or wounded. Details will be despatched by telegraph.

Later—The above was published in Paris on Sunday the 5th, and on the evening of that day cannon at the Hotel des Invalides announced the victory and the city was brilliantly illuminated.

On the following day [Monday] the Moniteur published the following despatches from the Emperor to the Empress:—

Magenta, June 5th—Yesterday our army was under orders to march on to Milan, across bridges thrown over the Ticino at Turbigo. The operation was well executed, although the enemy had repassed the Ticino in great force, and offered most determined resistance. The roadways were narrow. During two hours, the Imperial Guard sustained, unsupported, the shock of the enemy. In the meantime Mc-Mahon made himself master of Magenta after a sanguinary conflict. We repulsed the enemy at every point with a loss on our side, of about two thousand men. The enemy's loss is estimated at 15,000 killed and wounded. 5,000 Austrian prisoners remain in our hands.

Head Quarters, Monday, 8 a. m.—Milan is insurgent. The Austrians have evacuated the town and castle, leaving in their precipitation cannon and treasure of the army behind them. We are encumbered with prisoners, and have taken 12,000 Austrian muskets.

A despatch dated, Parrs, Monday night, to the London Post, sayed the municipality of Milan has proclaimed for King Emanuel and present an address to him in presence of the Emperor. To-morrow, the King will make his entry into Milan.

In the Austrian accounts received by way of Vienna, the information is meagre and unsatisfactory.

The Austrian telegraph from Vernon says:—"The authorities and the weak garrison of Milan, with the exception of Castle garrison, have withdrawn at the command of Gyulai. The town is quiet.

The following message from Vienna had been published by the Frankfort papers without any guarantee as to authenticity of the news.

Vienna, Monday—Through the opportune of the corps d'armee of Field Marshal Clam on the battle field, the Austrians were victorious over a hot fight.—The French are thrown back over the Ticino.

LATEST.

London, Wednesday.

The Times in its editorial remarks on the subject, says:—It now seems probable that this hard fight is even yet undecided, but on the whole the French have the best of it. The absence of the late telegrams by way of Paris is not considered indicative of French success.

The London Advertiser says it was rumoured last night that the Government received a telegraph from the British Minister at Vienna, announcing an Austrian victory. The opinion was becoming current in London that the victory of Magenta was a victory in which the French were defeated, and their failure to occupy Milan, only twelve miles from Magenta, strength[illegible]

The movements which preceded the battle of Magenta are not clearly stated; but it was previously announced that the allies were about to cross the Ticino to the number of about ten thousand men, and it is presumed that the rapid movement of the allied army prevented the Austrians completing that retreat which they had commenced, and compelled them to accept battle on the banks of the river.

The London Post says that General McMahon was raised on the battle field to the rank of a Marshal.

The Paris correspondent of the London Post says that the Emperor Napoleon was present at the battle of Magenta, but did not command in person. There is a report that General Canrobert was mortally wounded, and that five French Marshals or Generals were wounded.

The Patrie says that MarshalBaraguay D'Hilliers was removed from his command, and was replaced by Forey.

Marshal Vaillant is superseded by Randon, and the duties of Minister of War are to be confided provisionally to General Hereana.

There were rumours in Paris on the 8th that the French loss was 9,000 to 12,000 men hors de combat. Generals Neil and McMahon are said to be among the wounded.

Paris papers variously estimated the forces engaged at 100,000 to 120,000 French, and 130,000 to 180,000 Austrians.

General Garibaldi quitted Lecco, and General D'Urban had retreated to Monza. It is supposed that Garibaldi was directing his march against D'Urban.

The Paris correspondent of the London Post telegraphs that McMahon has been created Duke of Magenta.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Lords an Address in reply to the Queen's Speech was moved by Earl Powis and seconded by Lord Clifford. The conduct of the government, both in their domestic and foreign relations, was denounced by Lord Grenville and others, but after speeches in defence by Malmesbury and Derby, the address was agreed upon.

In the Commons the address to the Crown was moved by Mr. Egerton, seconded by Sir J. Elphinstone.

The Marquis of Hartington moved an amendment, to the effect that the present Ministry does not possess the confidence of the House. He reprehended the Government on the Reform question. Mr. Hanbury seconded the motion.

Mr. Disraeli defended the course of the Government. He stated that the reform question would be postponed till next session, and that the foreign policy of the Government would be peace. He called for an immediate division, and the question was about to be put, but the opposition were not yet prepared to vote, and after speeches by Lord Palmerston and others, Mr. Disraeli consented to adjourn the debate till the 11th instant.

A conference of the Liberal party was held in London on the 6th instant, pursuant to a call issued by Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell, and other prominent men.—Upwards of 250 members of Parliament are stated to have been present, and the proceedings were on the whole harmonious.

Kossuth would leave England for Italy on the 7th instant. He had an interview with the French Ambassador in London. Some 300 Hungarians who had returned from America were to follow him to Italy.

The Dublin correspondent of the London Herald mentions a rumor to the effect that Sir Edward Grogan is to succeed Sir Edmund Head in the Governor Generalship of Canada.

RUSSIA.

A circular to the envoys of Russia, at the several courts of Germany, declares that if Germany goes to the aid of Austria, the political equilibrium resulting from the treaties by which the German Confederation is constituted will be destroyed.

GERMANY.

A despatch from Darmstadt says that at the opening of chambers there the Presidents of both branches of the Legislature declared in favor of war against Napoleon.

THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

Paris, Sunday.

Great and glorious news has just reached Paris. We have to record another great victory over the Austrians. The Sardinian and French troops attempted to cross the Ticino at the bridge of Magentay esterday; they encountered stout resistance from the Austrians, who were eventually repulsed with great loss—15,000 are said to be slain, and 5,000 prisoners are captured. An accident on the electric telegraph has prevented us from obtaining further details, but the result is stated to be well authenticated.

The French are said to have suffered severely. The Emperor and the King are reported to have been present, but this lacks confirmation. Milan will be in the hands of the allied armies within the course of a few hours. Guylai has already transported his head-quarters to Rosate, halfway between Milan and Pavia, at which latter place the Austrians are concentrating large masses of troops. Prince Napoleon is ordered round from Pestoria to Milan to share in the glories and dangers of the Campaign.

If the Emperor has as yet failed to gain any personal glory by his achievements in the war, he has shown himself a consummate tactician. As yet he has failed in obtaining one of the main objects for which he has embarked in this tremendous contest. He has not succeeded in increasing his prestige with the army, in whose ranks the young and chivalrous Sardinian monarch is already so popular; but the sudden transfer of his operations from Casteggio to Vercelli, by which he has enabled his troops to carry all before them, and attack the enemy in its weak point, has been pronounced a masterpiece of strategy. The Austrians were under the impression, which the Emperor had artfully fostered, that they would be assailed in great force on the very spot where they had so recently suffered defeat. They had accordingly summoned large reinforcements from the several stations on the left bank of the Po, and had concentrated in great force opposite Stradella, to dispute the passage of the Po, and prevent the French and Sardinians from entering Liguria. They were led into that belief by the extraordinary concentration of the allied troops between Alexandria and Casteggio. Reinforcements were marched on to Voghera, Montebello, Vighizolo, Ponte Curone, and other places in the vicinity of Stradella, and on the opposite bank the Austrians were waiting their foes; but the locomotives which enabled Baraguay d'Hilliers to repair his terrible blunder at Casteggio, played also a notable part in the manœuvre which now commands our respect; by means of its potent agency, the troops were transferred from their positions, and suddenly planted at Vercelli. In the course of two days all these positions were bereft of their supplies forces, and posted at Vercelli, thence they [illegible]

The victory of Magenta is thus commented on in this evening's Patrie:—

"Victory is the only bulletin to-day.—A great battle has been fought in the neighborhood of Magenta, a little town in Lombardy, on the road from Novara to Milan, distant but a few kilometres from the left bank of the Ticino. Five thousand prisoners, and fifteen thousand Austrians killed and wounded, loudly proclaim the fact that the 4th of June was one of those days which decide the fate of a campaign. We had enormous forces opposed to us.—A Vienna despatch of the 3rd, published at Berlin yesterday, states that General Gyulai had removed his head-quarters to Abbiate-Grasso, in order to be able, at a given moment, to employ the whole of his concentrated forces. It is evident that these are the "concentrated forces," which we have just met and conquered."

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The real business in Parliament commenced on the 9th, when the Queen, in person delivered the following speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen:

I avail myself with satisfaction in the present anxious state of public affairs of the advice of Parliament, which I have summoned to meet with the least possible delay.

I have directed that papers shall be laid before you, from which you will learn how earnest and unceasing have been my endeavours to preserve the peace of Europe. Those endeavours have unhappily failed, and war has been declared between France and Sardinia on the one side and Austria on the other. Receiving assurance of friendship from both the contending parties, I intend to maintain between them a strict and impartial neutrality; and I hope, with God's assistance, to preserve to my people the blessing of continued peace.

Considering however, the present state of Europe, I have deemed it necessary to [illegible] our of my Crown to increase my naval forces to an amount exceeding that which has been sanctioned by Parliament. I rely with confidence on your cordial concurrence in this precautionary measure of defensive policy.

The King of the Two Sicilies having announced to me the death of the King, his father, and his own accession, I have thought, in concert with the Emperor of the French, to renew my diplomatic intercourse with the Court of Naples, which had been suspended during the late reign.—All my other foreign relations continue on a perfectly satisfactory footing.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

The estimates for the year, for which provision has not been made by the late Parliament, will be immediately laid before you, together with such Supplementary Estimates as present circumstances render indispensably necessary for the public service.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I have directed a bill to be prepared for giving effect, so far as the aid of Parliament may be required, to certain suggestions of the Commissioners whom I had appointed to inquire into the best mode of efficiently manning the Royal Navy; and I recommend this important subject to your immediate attention.

Measures of legal and social improvement, the progress of which, in the late Parliament, was necessarily interrupted by the dissolution, will again be brought under your consideration.

I should with pleasure give my sanction to any well-considered measure for the amendment of the laws which regulate the representation of my people in Parliament; and should you be of opinion that the necessity of giving your immediate attention to measures of urgency relating to the defence and financial condition of the country will not leave you sufficient time for legislating, with due deliberation, during the present Session, on a subject at once so difficult and so extensive, I trust that at the commencement of the next Session your earnest attention will be given to a question, of which any early and satisfactory settlement would be greatly to the public advantage.

I feel assured that you will enter with zeal and diligence on the discharge of your parliamentary duties, and I pray that the result of your deliberations may tend to secure the continuance of peace abroad, and progressive improvement at home.

Temperance History.

(From the Albany Evening Journal.)

It has been a question of a good deal of interest and enquiry among the writers on Temperance, as to when, where, and by whom, the first Temperance Society was organized. It was at length generally agreed, that it was at Moreau, in the State of New York, in 1808, by Dr. Billy, J. Clark, and the Rev. Mr. Armstrong. It is accordingly so stated in Appleton's new Cyclopedia, in an article on Total Abstinence, written by Mr. Greely. It seems however, that a society was established three years earlier (1805) at Allentos, New Jersey. Rev. E. Page, of Trenton, has lately forwarded the "Constitution Book" of that Society, (it was called the "Sober Society,") with the original fifty-eight signatures, to Prof. Anson McCoy, of Albany corresponding secretary of the World's Temperance Committee, and late editor of the Prohibitionist, who has long been collecting materials for a full and authentic history of the Temperance Reform, from its origin to the present time, tracing its influence upon the habits, the social usages, the politics, and the legislation, of this and other countries.

We infer that the prospect of a history from such a source, will be agreeable information to many friends of the cause. A distinguished and laborious collector of statistics on Temperance in New York, (the first who exposed the distillery milk nuisance in 1841, writes to a friend in Albany, as follows "Should I understand that it is Professor McCoy's purpose to prepare a full history of the Temperance Reform for publication? If such is his design, I should be happy to favour his object. The history of the Reform has never been written; and I would rejoice that it had been undertaken by one so eminently qualified to do it justice."

The most indifferent observer of this movement, or even an opponent of some of its latter phases, feels some interest in a faithful record of its rise and progress, when he is told that it was computed twenty years ago, that it had saved a million of lives; and that so learned and eminent an authority as the late Dr. John C. Warren, of Boston, held in his writings, that he had added not less than one-sixth to the wealth and moral energy of Massachusetts. A year before his death, writing from Marshfield, Daniel Webster expressed himself as follows: "There can be no question that the Temperance movement in the United States has done infinite good."

CANADIAN NEWS.

The Bank of Upper Canada and the Gore Bank have declared their usual half-yearly dividends. The former at the rate of 6, the latter at 8 per cent per annum.

Destructive Fire.—On Friday night the furniture warerooms of Mr. Alexander, in Guelph, were burned, as also the whole block known as Platt's Buildings. The loss it is stated will not fall far short of $10,000.

A man named Patrick Flood was arrested in London on Saturday, on a charge of having eloped with a Mrs. John Gray, taking her husband's coat with him. The case was fully proven, and Flood stands committed for trial.

Mr. Charles Freshman, late rabbi of the Jewish congregation at Quebec, has delivered two lectures in that city during this week. One on "The Spiritual necessities of Man and the adaption of Christianity to supply them;" the other "On the evidences of the Truth and the nature of Faith."

Sir Edmund Head.—It is reported in English papers that Sir Edmund Head is to be elevated to the Peerage, in acknowledgement of his distinguished services? The bright side of the subject, from a Canadian point of view, is to that in that case he will have a successor appointed in Canada.

The Weather.—The weather during the past week has been unusually cold in this vicinity. On Saturday there was ice formed half an inch in thickness, and snow was observed on the mountains to the N. E. of Quebec. The day continued raw and cold throughout, and stoves were recalled into operation. Yesterday, there was an improvement, the forenoon being bright and sunny; the evening was overcast, but no rain.—Quebec Chronicle.

Water Falling in Lake Erie.—The Port Clinton, Ohio, Democrat learns from fishermen in that vicinity, who have had occasion to notice the rise and fall of water in the Lake, that it has fallen gradually since the 1st of April, averaging three inches a week, which would make the water just two feet lower than during last summer. The fishermen make this note from their pound stakes, which now show two feet more timber above the water than they did previous to April first.

A Tomahawk Found inside a Sawlog.—The Messrs Gibson who own a sawmill in the neighborhood of Caledonia, were engaged a few days ago in sawing a pine log of about two feet and a half in diameter, when an unusual schreeching of the saw attracted their attention. They examined the cause of the noise, and found in the centre of the log an Indian tomahawk, in the eye of which was a piece of rotten wood, a part of its former handle. The log was otherwise perfectly sound.—Spectator.

Drowned.—On Monday forenoon, Mr. Panet, the coroner, was called to Point Levi, to hold an inquest on the body of a sailor named Wm. Boyce, aged 38 years, who fell from Tibbitt's wharf into the St. Lawrence and was drowned. The deceased belonged to the bark Fawcett, of Maryport, Cumberland Co., England, Thomas Surridge, master. Verdict:—"Accidentally drowned by falling from a wharf while in a state of intoxication."—Quebec Chronicle.

Execution of Rock, the Murderer.

Belleville, June 13th.

The execution of Samuel Peter Rock, for the murder of R. D. Dickie, took place at 8 A. M. Notwithstanding a heavy rain, which had been falling all morning, about 2,000 people were assembled. The culprit was attended to the scaffold by the Rev. Mr. Brennan. He was quite composed and collected, and made an extempore speech of half an hour's duration, confessing his guilt and severally censuring an editor of one of the newspapers of the place for some strictures on his personal appearance, and also some parties who had been confined with him in jail for spreading false reports. He concluded by requesting the people to join with him in saying the Lord's Prayer, at the close of which the trap fell, and he was launched into eternity.

A Woman Rescued from the Mormons.

A company of Pike's Peaker's passed through here last Sunday, having under their protection a young lady whom they had taken from a Mormon train, a few miles west of Newton, a short time previous. It appears that on last Sunday morning, as the Pike Peak boys were crossing Skunk Bottom, they passed a train of Mormons who were busily engaged—men, women, and children—in endeavouring to extricate a number of their waggons that were stuck fast in the mud. While stopping for a moment to witness the exertions of the Saints they accidently overheard a young girl of about 19 exclaim, "I wish I was drowned in that slough!" Their interest was at once awakened, and they interrogated her as to why she made such a foolish wish. She replied that she was tired of life; that she was started from Iowa City for Salt Lake with her father, who is a Mormon Elder; and that she had been compelled to walk all the way thus far, and when she expressed a wish to leave the train and return to the city they invariably stopped her mouth. She was informed by the Pikers that if she desired to return to Iowa City she should go back with them, on which she replied that she desired very much to return. The Mormons armed themselves with guns, knives, pistols, &c., &c., and declared that she would not go back. The Peak boys, nothing daunted, armed themselves with guns and revolvers as I announced their determination to take the girl at all hazards, and proceeded to carry out their intentions. For a time the fight seemed inevitible, but finally Mormon courage gave way, and the boys succeeded in placing the girl safely under their own protection. She then informed them that the Saints had a trunk and other baggage belonging to her, which they at once proceeded to obtain. The followers of Brigham boldly announced their intention to fight before they would permit the things to be taken from their waggons. A show of guns and revolvers, however cooled their ardor, and Mormon courage oozed out at their fingers' ends while the boys proceeded to transfer the baggage to their own waggons—the Saints looking on and uttering terrible imprecations against the perpetrators of the horrid outrages as they unroaded it. After obtaining all they sought, the rescuers drove away with the young lady in their possession, leaving the Mormons to console themselves as best they could in their loss. The Pike's Peakers who were engaged in the rescue, who numbered only about 28 men, were from Indiana, Illinois and Iowa City.—Jasper (Iowa) Free Press, June 2.

Garibaldi and his [illegible]

Foremost among the [illegible] whom the events of [illegible] notice must be reckoned the Italian Gen. Garibaldi. The sympathy which has always been given to the unhappy people whose land is at present the theatre of war—a sympathy which even now almost contralizes our sense of the dangers of French aggression—has been greatly increased of late years by the deeds of such men as the partisan leader who is now keeping Northern Lombardy in alarm. Indeed the events of 1849 have almost been sufficient to wipe away the stain which the ignorance of prejudices of ages had fixed on the Italian military character. Whatever may have been the deficiencies in courage and patriotism of the race among whom the young General Bonaparte burst sixty years ago, no one will have the hardihood to deny the Italians of the present day a spirit and an aptitude for warlike exploits equal to those of other European nations. The defence of Rome, taken by the French only after a regular siege, and by means of immense masses of troops, and the defence of Venice, with still greater energy and desperation, are remarkable events in the history of a people which has had no real military education, nor the independence which is thought necessary to create a patriotic and devoted spirit. Although the present war will, no doubt, be fought out by masses of disciplined troops, concentrated for the attack and defence of first-rate fortresses, and although the conflict of 600,000 men in a territory scarcely a hundred miles broad is not likely to leave much scope for guerilla warfare or the achievements of half-trained bands of volunteers, yet the ardor I sent of thousands of young men in every part of Northern and Central Italy must produce eventually some effect on the war, by giving reinforcements to the allies, and it is at least a convincing proof that the military energy of the Italians is not extinct. While the enlistment of volunteers is going on rapidly in Tuscany, so that the troops furnished by the Duchy will soon amount to 40,000 men, while, in spite of the discouragement of the French Government, fearful of priestly antagonism, the emigration from the Roman States of Tuscany and Piedmont is swelling into a deep and steady tide, the hero of 1849—Garibaldi—has entered Lombardy and planted the standard of insurrection among the most peaceful, timid and industrious of the Italian populations. It is easy enough to give reasons for every move which takes place in war. With a map in one's hand and a general knowledge of the disposition of the two armies, it is possible to judge approximately of the motives which prompt any act of strategy. But in this case we confess to seeing no more definite intentions on the part of Garibaldi than to penetrate into the Austrian territory at a point where it was unguarded, and there to create a political ferment by the spectacle of Austrian towns occupied, Austrian officials taken prisoners, and Italian regiments marching under a native commander, and displacing the Imperial flag for that which represents the hope of Italy.

Such bold movements are not to be desp

Garibaldi, the idol of the Italians, has a good number of French, Swiss and even English volunteers amongst the men under his command. He leads his battilions to the attack, and is always to be found in the thick of the fire.

SYNOD OF THE FREE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF CANADA.

The annual Synod commenced in Toronto on Monday evening, June 13.

There were prayers, and a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Wardrope, retiring Moderator, from 1st Corinthians, 1st chapter and 21st verse.

The roll of members was called over, after which

Rev. W. B. Clarke, of Quebec, was unanimously elected Moderator.

Some routine business having been gone through with the Synod adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 15.

The Synod resumed. Devotional exercises till 1 o'clock.

A discussion arose on the order of business, after which committees were appointed to examine the records of the Presbyteries and of the Synod.

Leave was granted to several Presbyteries, in response to applications received therefrom, to take a number of Students on trial for licence.

The Synod then adjourned till 6 p. m.

The Synod re-assembled at 6 o'clock.

The appeal of Vidal and Gemmil occupied the greater part of the evening. No decision was come to in the case.

The Clerk read a communication relative to the celebration of the tri-centenary anniversary of the Scottish Reformation. A committee was appointed to consider the best means of carrying into effect the proposal.

Memorials from the Grand Division Sons of Temperance, from the Daughters of Temperance, and other Temperance societies, praying that the Synod would make it their special subject of consideration. Resolutions were passed favorable to the Temperance movement, and acknowledging the present drinking usages to be the greatest hindrance to the spread of the Gospel.

The Synod then adjourned.

THURSDAY, June 16.

Rev. Newman Kirkland, Rev. Julius Straus, and Rev. John Stewart were received as ministers of the Church.

In accordance with the suggestion of the Presbytery of Cobourg, and in the absence of a minister whose reputation was involved, a committee was appointed to act in conjunction with the Presbytery, believing that such a course would have the effect of amicably arranging the matter, and a public discussion and investigation invited.

At 3 o'clock the Synod took a recess.

The Synod resumed at 3 o'clock.

Rev. Mr. Gregg presented the report of the College Committee. The report shows that the Institution is in a prosperous condition. The number of students who matriculated in Knox's College during the past year was 35. Besides these, there were other students who were studying with a view to the ministry, partly in that College and partly in University College. This was the largest number that had on any occasion completed the curriculum at the close of one session in Knox's College. The contributions during the year amounted to £5,477 this year, being an increase of £726 over last year. Besides the contributions thus referred to, a legacy of £500 from the late James Gibb, Esq., of Quebec, had been bequeathed the College.

It was agreed that the students of the second, as well as those of the first theological year, be required to attend the lectures on exegetical theology.

The consideration of minor points of detail connected with the reports occupied the remainder of the sitting.

FRIDAY, June 17.

The Synod met at 10 a. m.

A report was read from the committee on bills and overtures. The report was sustained.

On motion made and seconded, it was agreed to welcome Mr. Reed, a minister of the Free Church of Scotland.

The convener of the Union committee introduced the committee from the U. P. Church, who had come to communicate to this Church the decision of their Synod on the subject of the basis of union.

The Synod resumed the consideration of the College report.

The part of the report referring to the finances of the college, was the subject of a long and acrimonious discussion, which had not terminated when the Synod rose.

SATURDAY, June 18.

Business was resumed this morning at 10 o'clock.

The College report was the whole subject of debate during this day.

Rev. Mr. Bayne moved that a Committee be appointed to investigate the state of the College funds, and to ascertain generally the amount of debt due by the Synod in connection with its various schemes, and to report to the Synod at its present sitting. The motion was adopted, and the committee appointed.

MONDAY, June 20.

The Synod met at 11 o'clock.

The Committee appointed to enquire into the case of Vidal and Gemmil, reported that they acknowledged the complaint of Mr. Vidal, that Mr. Gemmil had made the statements he did in ignorance of certain facts, and that he be requested to retract his former statements.

The report was unanimously agreed to, and thus the dispute was amicably arranged.

The report of the committee appointed to investigate the subjects of complaint against, and the appeal of the Rev. F. Andrews against a deliverance of the Presbytery of Cobourg, relative to the conduct of Mr. Andrews, reported as follows:—After lengthened consideration your committee would recommend that with regard to the complaint and appeal, the Synod dismiss the complaint and appeal and confirm the deliverance of the Presbytery.—It is also the opinion of the committee that the difficulties mentioned in the reference were of such a nature as to render necessary the dissolution of the pastoral tie, and they recommend the Synod to approve of the action of the Presbytery in suggesting to Mr. Andrews the propriety of resigning his charge, and that in the event of Mr. Andrews not acting on the suggestion of the Presbytery, the Synod instruct the Presbytery to dissolve the pastoral tie, and declare the charge vacant, according to the laws of the Church.

After discussion, during which it was contended that the Synod had no right to dissolve the pastoral tie, a motion adopting the report was carried.

The committee appointed to ascertain the financial position of the church report that the entire receipts for the past year amounted to £14,963 2s, and the expenditure, $13,131 57.

On motion the report was adopted.

The ninth annual report of the Buxton Mission Committee was read, received and adopted.

The Synod re-assembled at 6 o'clock.

The first business brought before the Synod was the further consideration of the proposal for the union of the churches, and printed copies of the basis of union, as agreed upon by the United Presbyterian Church, were circulated amongst the members of the Synod.

Rev. Messrs. Topp, Wardrope, Bayne, Willis, Clark, Kemp and Ure spoke at length on the different points of the proposed basis of union.

The debate was, at half-past 11, adjourned, and the Synod then separated, to resume the discussion on the following morning.

TUESDAY, June 21.

The Synod assembled at 10 o'clock.

The whole day was taken up in discussing the basis of union of the churches.

Thus far the feelings of the Synod seem to be strongly in favor of the union. We are unable to find space for any of the speeches on the subject. We will give the result in our next issue.

SYNOD OF THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Synod of the United Presbyterian Church commenced its session in Rev. Dr. Jennings' Church, Toronto, on Monday evening. The retiring Moderator, Rev. Mr. Aitkens, of Smith's Falls, preached from 1st Cor. i., 17, and opened the Synod by craving the Divine blessing to rest on its sittings.

Rev. Wm. Ormiston was unanimously elected Moderator.

After the disposal of some formal business, the Synod adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 14.

The Synod met at 9 o'clock.

The Moderator ruled that no Presbytery could meet during the Session of the Synod.

The application of Rev. Mr. Clerihew after some debate was refused.

Rev. Dr. Taylor read the report of the joint committee appointed at the last Synods of the U. P. Church and the Free Church, to take the subject of union into consideration.

The report was received, and thanks were given to the committee for preparing the report.

A report was presented detailing the operations of Presbyteries in reference to their different missions. The report was satisfactory.

WEDNESDAY, June 15.

The Synod met at 9 o'clock.

The Clerk said that the first order of the day was the discussion of the proposed basis of union.

This occupied the whole of the day's sitting.

In the evening session Mr. Torrance read the report of the Committee on Missions. The conclusion seems to be inevitable, that there is no recognized standard of liberality among the people.

Mr. Torrence also read a long statistical report, giving in detail the membership, attendance, &c., of congregations in each of the 8 Presbyteries. Number of congregation, 96; of stations, 32; total average attendance, 11,818; members added, 1,132; members removed, 537; number of baptisms, 772. The report throughout was favorable.

THURSDAY, June 16.

The Synod met at 9 o'clock. After devotional exercises, the Synod resolved itself again into committee of the whole on the articles of the proposed basis of union.

The several articles were taken up, discussed and adopted.

The remainder of the day's business was merely of a routine character. The Synod adjourned at 9 o'clock, p. m.

FRIDAY, June 17.

The Synod resumed business this morning.

The committee appointed to act with the Clerk in engrossing the findings of the committee of the whole on the basis of Union, which findings were afterwards adopted, with the view of being laid with all convenient speed before the Synod of the Free Church now in session, reported that they had now to present a correct copy of the findings. The committee recommended that the members of the committee of Union, with the clerk of this committee, be appointed to convey this basis to the Synod of the Free Church. The report was read and adopted.

A report was presented recommending that should Mr. Carruthers be restored to health, he be employed in missionary labor within any Presbytery in which he may be residing. The report was received and adopted.

SATURDAY, June 18.

The Synod did not meet this morning as was arranged.

Austrian Armaments and Preparations.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times writing on the 23rd, says:

"Some distinguished officers are of opinion that the commander of the Austrian forces ought not to have crossed the road leading from Voghera to Placenza, but Count Stadion, who is the commander of the 5th corps d'armee, had received orders to acquire accurate knowledge (genaue Kenntnis) of the position and strength of the French force near Voghera, which was under the command of Gen. McMahon. I yesterday ventured to ask whether Count Stadion had not received a check, and the reply to my question was—'As he had succeeded in executing the order given him, and made good his retreat to the left bank of the Po, it cannot be said that he received a schlappe (check.) It is said that he suffered a severe loss, but so did the enemy who was in great force. We are satisfied with the result of the expedition, as we have learned the exact position and strength of the right wing of the enemy, and have, besides, acquired the conviction that our troops fight as well as the French.' The 1st d'armee, which is commanded by Gen. Count Clam-Gallas, will in a few days go from Bohemia to Innspruck, by way of Dresden, Hof, Bamberg, Nuremberg, and Munich. The corps consisted of 60,000 men, with the customary number of guns. Six cavalry regiments are also on their way from Galicia to Innspruck.—The Austrian army at present consists of twelve corps d'armee, but an order to raise four new corps is likely to be issued. In a few days an Imperial ordinance for a 'conscription' of 100,000 men will be published. The late Marshal Marmont used to say that Austria could 'stamp armies out of the earth;' and Louis Napoleon will find that such is really the case. How Austria is to maintain such a vast host is a problem which wiser men than myself are unable to solve. There are now six Austrian corps, consisting of about 240,000 men, in Italy, and by the middle of the month of June the army will probably be 325,000 strong; with 75,000 horses, and from 850 to 900 guns. There are people who talk of the war being ended in one campaign. Napoleon has an enemy to deal with whom he will either not be able to overcome at all, or only after a long and deadly struggle. The idea of 'localizing' the war is absurd, for the Christian population in European Turkey are ripe for mischief, and there will soon be a general rising among them."

The Augsburg Gazette contains the following particulars relative to the command of the Army, its strength and position.—According to this journal, "its centre, under the immediate command of Marshal Gyulai, is stationed between Mortara and Pavia; the right, under the orders of Gen. Zobel, is in the line between Novara and the Lago Maggiore; while the left, under the orders of General Benedek, stretches between Pavia and Piacenza, with its advanced forts reaching as far as Stradella. To this corps d'armee belongs the column commanded by General Stadion, which fought at Montebello. The total number of Austrian troops in Italy is about 200,000." The same journal contains various statements referring to the arrangements and organization of the Franco-Sardinian army. 'The corps of Gen. Neil,' it says, 'forms the extreme left of the army, and stretches towards the Dora Baltea, with a view of covering Turin. The corps of Marshal Canrobert forms the centre of Alexandria. The guard under the orders of General Regnault St. Jean d'Augely, is collected between Genoa and Alexandria, and forms the reserve. General McMahon commands a corps d'armee at Valenza.—The Sardinian division, under the command of General Cialdini, is in line between Casale and Frassinetto; the division of General Fauti at Alexandria; that of Gen. Cachiari at Novi; and lastly, that of Gen. Durando at Acqui."

Kossuth on the War.

No one can have read, without admiration, the noble speech in which Kossuth recently expounded his views of the position and tendency of European affairs. It is an admirable, and almost irresistible, appeal on behalf of those nationalities whose hopes of freedom and independence are again beginning to revive. Such an exposition comes in good time, and is fitted to do good service; for we are certainly ready to admit that there is a danger of the British people forgetting the complex character of their relations to the present war, and being led by the heat of jealous feeling, and the influence of foreign intrigue, into a position relative to France which might be productive of the most deplorable consequences. That Britain is right in guarding its position of neutrality by every precaution, in the way of naval and military preparations, we of course, maintain to be beyond dispute. There are also just and reasonable grounds for making such preparation, with a view, more especially, to the position of France, and to its possible proceedings in combination with Russia.—In all this we can see nothing that is unreasonable, and none of the "fanaticism" which one-sided and partizan writers have discovered. When every other nation is in arms, it is time that Britain should arm too; and those who condemn her doing so under such circumstances convict themselves, beyond doubt, of partisanship, but do not convict Britain of any departure from a strict and impartial neutrality.

Dispassionate people will pretty generally agree that this is all right so far. But the question next arises, as put by Kossuth, what side, in the event of Britain departing from its neutrality, would it be likely to take? He is, of course, correct in supposing that it would take the side of Austria; but we feel quite assured that it is the general desire of the British people that no circumstances may occur to necessitate its taking that course. No British Government, certainly, is likely to interfere to save Austria from its own subjects, even with such foreign aid as they may be able to obtain. But, while considering the "down-trodden nationalities," Britain must have a due regard to her own position and interests. That these are in any way bound up with the maintenance of the Austrian empire we do not believe. As against France and Russia, indeed, she is, in self-interest, obliged to support Austria, but there is no such consideration calling on her to sustain the Hapsburg dynasty against the attempts of Italy or Hungary to gain their independence. On this point there is, doubtless, a difference of opinion in England, and perhaps the Conservatives may endeavour to engage Britain in the war, whenever the danger to Austria appears to extend beyond her Italian provinces. But such is not the policy which the nation means or desires, when, by its actions, it proclaims its determination to maintain its interests at home and abroad. The mere fact of the French intervention appearing likely to free Hungary as well as Italy would afford no reason for the interference of Great Britain, but would only yield an additional motive for increased carefulness in maintaining its neutrality.—At bottom, there is certainly no lukewarmness in the British heart towards de-nationalized races of the Continent. But there is a natural check to the policy which friendly feeling may dictate, arising from considerations which those who, like Kossuth, have a partisan interest, very naturally underestimate, and would fair persuade Britain to overlook. It is all very well to show that the cardinal involved in this war is that of the independence of the nationalities. No doubt it is so. But on Kossuth's own showing, it is impossible to define the scope and limits of any war such as this. He tells us so in language which should be accepted as a rebuke by those who have dogmatized with so much assurance on this particular point. And the war may, unhappily, come to involve interests which Britain could not possibly stand by and see sacrificed. We suppose there is nothing irrational in surmising the possibility of Turkey being involved in the war. Symptoms have already shown themselves which prove that the danger of this is imminent. French influence, it is also alleged, is being exercised in exciting a disposition on the part of the Viceroy of Egypt, to throw off his allegiance to the Sultan. Now, supposing there is any foundation for such ideas, and that the roads to the East were threatened by the French crusade in behalf of all disaffected dependencies, it is quite plain that in spite of her sympathy for Italy and Hungary, Britain would be compelled, by considerations of self-interest, which must always be paramount in such affairs, to depart from her neutrality and to take an active share in the war.

Britain is undoubtedly placed in an awkward predicament at present. The French Emperor has espoused the popular side, and he has waited on events with that patience which seldom fails to meet with a reward. He has the sympathies of all those who have a plentiful stock of that sort of commodity ready to take away without any troublesome doubts or difficulties, or to barter for the trifling consideration of a short-lived popular applause. All the one-sided theoretical, unconscientious class of people going at this sort of thing without hesitation. But those who wield the destinies of England must possess themselves in a different frame. Those who are responsible must look ahead and on all sides, and, without disregarding those liberal views of humanity and justice which ought to sway British policy, must, nevertheless, hold them as secondary considerations to those of self-interest to which the government of every nation is bound, within certain limits, to give the first place.—Even Kossuth cannot persuade us that there is no occasion for such wary vigilance at the present time. It was not with a view to a war with Austria that the French Emperor made such strenuous efforts to increase his navy, until a few weeks ago he had actually a larger force of ships in commission than Great Britain. We have every respect for Kossuth's profound insight, and an unqualified admiration for his eloquence and for his character which has never wavered when those who are now quoting him as an authority were loud in his abuse. We have not one word of objection against anything contained in his admirable oration. The only fault we have to find is with what he left out. He had but one idea, one object in his mind, that of nationality. He can give us no assurance or satisfactory reason to believe that this will be the only issue put on trial in the course of the war. On many other hypotheses, all perfectly reasonable and even likely in character, other issues of a totally different nature may arise, and, with a view to this probability, England's policy must be shaped. Its neutrality must be guarded and jealous, and the special object of its jealousy must, necessarily, be France, as being the only one calculated to excite it. Britain has nothing to fear from Austria, but much to fear from her immediate neighbor, a simple and undeniable fact which should suffice to put a stop to the absurdity of those who denounce her precautionary movements as insulting to France. They are so to a less extent than those of Russia are insulting to Prussia and Austria; and Russia, we know, like France is an honorable power, and does nothing but what is fair and right. If France is insulted by Britain preparing to equal it in the means of self-defence, then it is time that the insult should be given and accepted. But the French in this case, we believe, will exhibit more sense and tolerance than their trans-Atlantic admirers, and will not seek to avenge as a wrong to themselves either the freedom of speech or the armament enjoyed and practiced by their British neighbors.—Scottish American Journal.

Neutrality Claimed by the Pope.

The following note has been addressed to all the members of the diplomatic body accredited at Rome, and particularly the French and Austrian:—

"PALACE OF THE VATICAN, May 3.

"The hopes entertained of maintaining peace in Europe have not been fulfilled.—According in the announcement in the official journals, made by the two nations, it is clear that hostilities will soon commence.

"Such a state of things seriously affects the heart of the Holy Father, who investes with the sublime character of the common Father of the Faithful, and as the Vicar of Him who is the Author of Peace, and likewise in accordance with the duties of the Apostolic ministry, desires nothing, nor does he demand anything of God in his present prayers, but to behold so dear and precious a blessing as peace to prevail over the whole earth.

"Yet amid the sadness which fills his heart, his Holiness loves to trust in the good feeling of the Powers to arrest, or at least diminish, the dangers, which menace Europe, if it be impossible to avert them.—Whatever course events may take, his Holiness demands, with reason, that in case of war, the neutrality shall be respected which the Pontifical Government intends to maintain as suitable to its character—a neutrality which it can never deviate, as it declared under other circumstances, and as it now declares for good reasons.

"His Holiness expects, therefore, that any collision shall be avoided which might inflict injury on the Roman States and the subjects of the Holy See. Although the Holy Father is full of confidence in the reasons already expressed, yet in so important a question he thought it his duty to give to the undersigned Cardinal Secretary of State the special charge to address to your Excellency the present note, with a request to communicate it to your Government, and to give it to understand of how much consequence it is to leave the Pontifical Government and its States in a condition which alters in no respect the neutrality which is peculiar to it by reason of its exceptional character—a neutrality which the public law acknowledges, and which the great powers have all admitted under similar circumstances. In expectation that your Excellency will make an affirmative reply to his communication, the undersigned has the honour to renew the sentiment of his high consideration.

"JAMES CARDINAL ANTONELLI."

A letter from Rome, under date May 28th says:—

"France has accepted the neutrality of the Papal States; but it is said that Piedmont has not; consequently we may see Piedmontese soldiers enter the Legation; but France will interfere no doubt to avoid such a complication. There is no doubt that a revolution will shortly break out in the Romanga; everything is ready for an explosion. The French police, have by order of Gen. Goyon imprisoned the following individuals at Civitia Vecchia:—Ciro Luni, Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce; Felix Aviani, Charles Berlingeri, Giachetti, Sestria, inspector of the arsnel, and three other persons. They were arrested on suspicion of being warm partisans of Austr... The departure of volunteers continues. Yesterday 300 set out. They were accompanied to the railway terminus by a great crowd. The situation of the States of the Church is becoming critical."

BURNING OF THE 'EASTERN MONARCH.'

LOSS OF LIFE.

PORTSMOUTH, Friday.

The Eastern Monarch left Kurrachee on the 22nd of February last, with the following officers and troops on board, for Gravesend:—

Colonel Allen of the 31st Regiment in command; Captain Molesworth, 27th Regiment, lady and two children; Captain Usher, 57th Foot, lady and three children; Captain Manning 24th Regiment, and Captain Stopford of the 32nd Regiment; Lieutenants Clive, of 32nd, and Graeham 27th Regiments; Quarter-Master Neville, 70th Foot, and Assistant Surgeon Kidd, 27th Regiment, in medical charge; 352 men invalids, from various regiments in the North-Western Provinces of India: 30 women and 53 children. Fifteen deaths occurred on the passage home. Lieutenant-Colonel Muren, of the 60th Rifles and lady: and Lieutenant Walsh, of the Bombay Artillery also came home passengers by the ship.—She had light baffling winds down to the Line, touched at St. Helena, and after leaving the "trades" met with easterly winds.

In consequence, the provisions ran short, and Captain Morris, the commander of the ship, decided upon calling at Spithead to obtain a supply of fresh meat and vegetables for the people on board, where the ship anchored at about 1.30 a. m., yesterday morning. The chief mate, Mr. Naracett, about an hour after the ship had brought up was walking the poop, the crew being employed aloft, furling the sails, and had just completed the topsails, and were about to commence furling the courses, when the explosion took place, blowing out the scuddy sky-lights on the poop, and carrying away the poop ladders. Inside the cuddy was a mass of ruins—decks torn up and bulkheads and glass shattered and mixed in a thousand fragments, the whole cuddy and decks being filled with a choking sulphurous vapor. Officers and ladies rushed on deck in their night dresses, the troops below leaping from their hammocks, and barely escaping the flames; with such rapidity did these spread along the deck. The whole of the ship's ports being open for ventilation the current of air, of course, urged them along in the fury.

Captain Morris despatched a boat to the men-of-war, at Spithead for assistance, and ordered the fire-engine and pumps to be rigged to endeavour to subdue the fire, but by this time it was beyond human control. The boats (four) were lowered, and the ladies, women and children were being passed over the stoe. The troops were paraded by Colonel Allan's orders, and were under the most perfect command; every man obeyed his orders most implicitly. By this time the boats from the men-of-war Falcon and Flying Fish were alongside and the men lowered themselves by ropes from the fore part of the ship and bowsprit the after part being a mass of flame. The remaining women and children were lowered down to the boats at the same time by those on board the ship. Every possible means seems to have been used for the saving of life, and as fast as the people were taken off the ship they were conveyed on board the Falcon and Flying Fish, and some small craft, near at the time. Two ballast barges deserve particular mention. They bore down to the burning ship under canvass and by Captain Morris's directions dropped their anchor under the ship's bows to enable the boats to reach them quickly with their living freights from the ship.

The barges, however, dropped so close to the vessel that numbers of men and women dropped on to their decks from the ship's bowsprit and bows, the fore part of the ship being the clearest from fire. The conduct of the men in these barges (the Providence and the Petrel) is stated by the captain of the ship and the officers in command of the troops to have been beyond all praise. In half an hour's time from the explosion every one that could be found was got out of the ship, and as the last boats left her sides, the flaming masts fell by the board. At this time Mr. Smith, gunner, of the Falcon rendered essential service by his exertions in towing the two barges laden with people from the ship out of the way of the fallen spars. Lieutenant Henry Bagge, of her Majesty's ship Fulcan, was everywhere conspicuous by his exertions and judicious arrangements in saving lives; and many others were equally zealous, but from the excitement which prevailed, were not perhaps equally noticed.

One woman and five children were killed or suffocated by the explosion. This with one soldier who died soon after reaching the shore of exhaustion from being in the water, and one child is, we believe, the only loss of life; a large number have received contusions and burns. The pilot is missing, but whether he has got ashore at Ryde, as he belongs to the Isle of Wight, is not yet known. The whole of the officers, ladies men, women and children who were landed at Portsmouth from the unfortunate vessel were, of course, in the state they jumped out of their beds in—ladies and women in their night clothes, officers and men in a pair of trousers and shirt, and many of the men without latter—all, of course without shoes or stockings. The officers both those belonging to the ship and the military, have lost their property, which amount with many of the latter to something very considerable. Colonel Allan speaks in the highest terms of the conduct of the men under his command, and says of his own officers and Capt. Morris, and the officers of the ship, "nothing could exceed their coolness, spirit and gallantry."

The troops, women and children have been quartered in the various barracks and hospitals in the town, where their wants have been supplied by the authorities. At the hotels, and in many cases in the private dwellings of the inhabitants, every one seemed to vie with the other in rendering the romotest assistance to the sufferers as they landed. The Quebec was literally crammed in a very short time, and coffee, brandy, &c., served out at ad libitim.

The appearance of the burning ship from Portsmouth ramparts and the beach from about 3 until six 6 a. m., was magnificent in the extreme. The excitement among the crowd assembled was intense, as with a glass human beings could be discerned jumping from the ship's sides into the sea, from which, of course, they were picked up by the boats. After the whole of the people had been taken from the ship, the Falcon stood towards her, and fired several shot into her to endeavor to sink her, but without effect. The hull of the ship continued burning fiercely until about mid-day when the greater body of the flames was subdued, but immense bodies of smoke continued to ascend from the ship. About 9 a. m., a body of flame burst out from the after part of the ship, reaching to an immense height. A dense smoke now(6 p. m.) hangs over the ship. Several Government steamers have been in attendance by her the whole day. The following letter has been addressed to Captain Morris by the military officers in charge of the troops:—

"PORTSMOUTH, June 5.

"Sir,—The officer commanding the invalids, the officers under his command, and the passengers who arrived this morning at Portsmouth by the ship Eastern Monarch, from the Kurrachee, cannot take leave of you without expressing the deep sympathy they all feel for you on the frightful loss of your ship, which occured at Spithead when at anchor. This has been generated by the invariable kindness and attention to them on their voyage, and the gallant efforts made by you to save life when the ship was so suddenly destroyed by fire this morning at Spithead. They all feel deeply greatful, and it must be some satisfaction to you to know that no human forethought could have prevented this sad calamity, and they desire to express this to so public a manner as possible."

"They beg of Captain Morris to convey their thanks to his chief officer, Mr. Narracott, and all his officers, for whose behavior on this trying occasion they feel the greatest admiration."

[Signed by Colonel Allan and the whole of the officers and passengers on board.]

The Eastern Monarch was a frigate built East Indiaman, of 1,709 tons burthen.

The Case of Mrs. Halsey.

Fanny Deane Halsey's unexplained fate still agitates the public mind, and proves to be more than a nine days wonder. The facts, so far as known, have appeared in our columns. She was found dead in the bay, near Fort Hamilton, on Sunday the 5th inst., having been missing from the previous Wednesday. A coroner's jury made a hasty examination, and came to the conclusion that she was dead, and that there was no evidence before them that death was not accidental. No evidence touching the cause of her death was taken; no effort was made to trace her from the day she disappeared; and although public opinion had already made free with the name of her husband and that of a Mr. Wells of Brooklyn, both of whom were under informal arrest on suspicion of connection with her fate, the coroner ignored all the evidence supposed to be at hand to dissolve or condemn those men, dismissed them, and closed the case

The mother of Mrs. Halsey announces her intention to have a further enquiry, and denies the statement that she knew anything of her daughter's alleged intimacy with Mr. Wells. She says the deceased was passionately attached to her children—the youngest of whom is but eight weeks old. Mrs. Deane denounces the coroner's proceedings as a mock inquest, and seems to have been certain that there has been foul play. On the other hand, Halsey, the husband, has issued a card denying that he was not at his wife's funeral, and that he has hidden himself from Mrs. Deane and her friends. His counsel confesses that the inquest was blamable, and that a more thorough one ought to take place. Altogether the case is a puzzling one. No sufficient reason for committing suicide has been shown—certainly none could induce a mother to leave an infant of that tender age; no aberration of mind has been alleged; no fatal accident seems to have been probable: no fears of exposure on the part of any of the party appear to indicate that she died by violence; the examination of the body neither proves nor disproves anything; all that is certainly known is that the woman is dead.—New York Times.

THE SEVEN HUMAN BODIES IN A BOX.

The mystery surrounding the seven human bodies found floating in a box off Port Morris, has been easily and satisfactorily explained. The corpses prove to be not bodies destined for dissection, nor those of a murdered family, but simply the disinterred remains of paupers being transferred from Old Potter's Field, on Fourth avenue to another and more quiet resting-place on Ward's Island. It seems that the contractors who have taken the job of removing the bodies convey them from the foot of Forty-ninth street by means of a barge. The workmen who disinter the bodies are not practiced or skilful undertakers, and if they can save the contractors a little by forcing a number of bodies into one box they do so. Notwithstanding the fact that no interments have taken place in the Old Potter's Field for sixteen or seventeen years, many of the corpses taken up are found to be in an excellent state of preservation, some to all appearances being as fresh as when first buried. Wednesday the barge made her usual trip to Ward's island, and in transferring the boxes to the shore one or two of them tumbled into the water. With the remark that it would be heard of in time, the workman let it float off.—When Coroner Valentine, of West Farms, was summoned to hold an inquest, he conjectured where the bodies came from, and immediately came down to the city, to ascertain whether his suspicions were correct. Mr. Webb superintendant of the City Cemetery, told him of the occurrence alluded to above, and directed him to Mayor Tinneman, as the proper official to take action in the premises. Mayor Tinneman on being informed of the occurrence, addressed a note to Mr. Webb, directing him to attend to the matter forthwith. Yesterday afternoon he went to West Farms, and having fully identified the box, took it down to Ward's Island. Thus the mystery is explained. The lime found surrounding the bodies was placed there by the workmen to destroy the disagreeable effluvia, and the clothing was in no better state of preservation than the bodies.—N. Y. Times, June 7th.

A COSTLY MISTAKE.—Rev. George W. Quimby, of Cincinnati has recovered $2,500 from an apothecary of that city for putting up for him belladonna instead of dandelion, by which his health was materially injured.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—It is to be regretted that there are persons in every community who have such a desire to see their conceptions clothed with print that they must write upon every imaginable topic, and too often without consideration, and without taking the trouble to enquire whether they are correctly informed upon the subject they undertake to attack or defend, and, as in the case of the Review's correspondent "Mechanic," without considering the effect of the publication of their lubrications. If "Mechanic" had given less attention to "rumor" and more to fact, he would have learned that the merchants of Peterboro' are not opposed to Market regulations, so far as they relate to articles brought into Town for sale that enter into general consumption, but they are opposed to undue restrictions being put upon trade. Did it never occur to "Mechanic" that he could advocate his cause without making vulgar attacks upon those who he fancied were opposed to him, or without endeavouring to coerce others by impudent threats.

I would ask "Mechanic" if he thinks his communication on the Market By-law is likely to do good, or create harmony and good feeling in the Town, or if he does not think it more likely to create division by setting one class against another, or does he think he is doing the town a service by attacking those who are endeavouring to build it up by circulating money in purchasing articles for shipment, for the benefit of the whole community.

When the By-law in question was under consideration last year the business men of the town presented a respectable petition to the Council, and although it received no attention at their hands, (for reasons well known), the signers did not fly into the newspapers to attack any class of the inhabitants. No, Sir, they did what they considered was their duty under the circumstances, and when they failed in gaining their point, they quietly submitted, and were willing to allow time to convince people that trade cannot be long checked, or confined to any particular spot by any legislation, but will always seek out and flow into natural Channels. If the Market By-Law be established upon a sound basis, and, if it is found to be for the interest of the farmer to take his commodities to the Market place for sale he will do so, in the face of all opposition, but not otherwise.

If "Mechanic" will examine the petition presented to the Council, and all the opinions lately submitted to the By-law committee he will not, I think, find a single word that could by any means be construed as an interference with the interests of the class which, he assumes the Championship.

Yours respectfully,

TRADE.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—Will you have the kindness to publish in the next issue of your paper the following resolutions, passed at the last meeting of the Peterboro' Division Sons of Temperance, and by so doing you will confer a favour.

Yours truly

W. J. MASON, R. S.

Resolved—That Bro. the Rev. William Scott, be granted a Withdrawal Card, he being entitled to the same, and under no charge whatever.

Resolved—That the members of this Division feel that they cannot allow Bro. Scott to take his departure from this town without expressing their deep regret at his removal; and also of thanking him for the willingness which he has always manifested to forward the Cause of Temperance by his fearless and able exposition of its principles and claims. The Division feel that in the removal of Bro. Scott, the Temperance Cause in this place is loosing a sincere and zealous friends one whose thorough practical knowledge of, and firm conviction in the correctness of its principles, will not be easily replaced, but they are quite certain that the cause in general will lose nothing by the change, for in the more extended field of usefulness to which he has been called, he will still continue to throw the whole weight of his talents and influence in favour of the greatest reform needed in Canada.

Resolved—That the R. S. be directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to Bro. the Rev. Wm. Scott and also to the Toronto Christian Guardian, as well as to the Peterboro' Review and Examiner Newspapers.

Rust in Wheat.

There is no doubt that the variety of spring wheat called Fife wheat resists the rust more than any other known variety.—There is also, unfortunately, no doubt that the sudden demand which has arisen for this variety has caused an immense amount of wheat to be sold as "Fife wheat" which really is only common spring wheat approaching the Fife wheat in appearance.

Farmers may save their own "rust proof" varieties by carefully examining rusted fields and patches of wheat, and observing those heads of wheat which have resisted the rust, and saving them and keeping the seed of these heads distinct.

This plan will doubtless answer as well with fall wheat as with spring wheat, and thus each observant farmer may not only benefit himself, but the country generally.

Mr. Fife, of Otonabee, discovered the true "Fife wheat" in this way, and has thus proved one of the greatest benefactors Canada ever had.

It is by similar means, and by carefully preserving and experimenting upon various plants and seeds, that most of the valuable modern varieties of plants have been obtained.

Wheat, like other plants raised from seed, is continually producing new varieties, and it is by observing and separating these varieties that new and valuable sorts are preserved.

BY-LAW No.—

A By-Law to authorize the Mayor of the Town of Peterborough, to raise by way of loan, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds, for the purposes therein specified, and to issue Debentures therefor, and provide for the payment thereof.

Passed the day of A. D. 1859.

WHEREAS, the Municipality of the Town of Peterborough, did on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, pass a By-Law authorizing the Mayor of the said Town, to take three thousand shares of stock in the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company, on behalf of the said Municipality

And Whereas, the said Municipality did borrow from the Municipal Loan Fund, Debentures, to the extent of twenty-five thousand pounds currency, and did also issue Debentures under a By-Law passed on the tenth day of May, A. D., 1858, to the extent of twelve thousand five hundred pounds, for the purpose of paying the stock so subscribed as aforesaid.

And Whereas the sum of eight hundred and twenty-five pounds, is still required to pay the balance of the said stock so subscribed, and the expenses attending the negotiation of the aforesaid Debentures.

And Whereas the sum of two hundred and seventy-five pounds is required to pay the Government for the balance due on the Land, at the South end of the Town, and the claims of the Squatters thereon.

And Whereas it is desirable and necessary to expend in grading, gravelling, and otherwise improving the streets of the said Town of Peterborough, the sum of four hundred pounds, making in all for the objects enumerated above, the sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And Whereas it will require Debentures to be issued to the amount of two thousand pounds, to realize the said sum of one thousand five hundred pounds.

And whereas it will require the sum of three thousand two hundred pounds, to be raised by a special rate, for the payment of such loan, and interest thereon, for the space of ten years, to be computed from the day of A. D., 1859, to the day of A. D., 1869, exclusive of the first and last days, by annual amounts as follows, that is to say:

For the year	1860, the sum of	£320
	1861 "	320
	1862 "	320
	1863 "	320
	1864 "	320
	1865 "	320
	1866 "	320
	1867 "	320
	1868 "	320
	1869 "	320

And Whereas it is proposed that Debentures to the amount of Two Thousand Pounds shall be issued, payable with interest at six per cent. as hereinafter mentioned for the purposes aforesaid.

And Whereas the assessed value of the whole ratable property of the said Town of Peterborough amounts to the sum of Seventeen Thousand six hundred and eighty one pounds according to the assessment returns thereof for the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty Eight being the financial year next preceding the year of the passing of this By-Law.

And Whereas it is necessary for the payment of the interest aforesaid and for the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the principal money of such loan to raise ten annual special rates in the pound upon the total value of the whole of the ratable property as hereinafter described, viz:

For the year

1850	four pence	ths of a penny	in the	pound.

1866	"	"	"	"
1867	"	"	"	"
1868	"	"	"	"
1869	"	"	"	"

over and above and in addition to all other rates and assessments imposed, for the payment of the said interest and for the creation of a sinking fund, for the payment of the principal money of the said debentures, according to the requirements of the statutes in such cases made and provided.

And Whereas this By-law has been and was approved of, by a majority of the duly qualified Municipal Electors of the said Town of Peterborough ascertained in the manner pointed out in the 192nd section of the Upper Canada Municipal Act.

Be it therefore enacted by the Town Council of the Town of Peterborough, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that for the purpose of raising the said sum of One Thousand Five Hundred Pounds for the purpose aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Mayor of the said Town of Peterborough for the time being, and he is hereby authorised, and required to issue debentures upon the credit of the said Town of Peterborough in sums not less than One Hundred Pounds each, and bearing interest at six per cent per annum, to the extent of Two Thousand Pounds as aforesaid, to be under the common seal of the said Town, to be signed by the Mayor and countersigned by the Clerk thereof, to be made payable in ten years from and after the passing of this By-law. The interest to be payable at the office of the Town Treasurer, half yearly on the days of and respectively, in and for each of the said ten years.

And be it enacted by this By-law shall come into force and take effect on the day of A. D. 1859.

TAKE NOTICE

THAT the above is a true copy of a proposed By-law which will be taken into consideration by the Council of this Municipality after one month from the first publication in the Examiner Newspaper, the date of which first publication was on Thursday the ninth day of June, A. D. 1859, and that the votes of the electors of the said Municipality will be taken for the North Ward, in the shop of Hugh Evans, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M., James Liace Returning Officer. For the Centre Ward in the Livery Stable of Thomas Bentzard, on Friday the first day of July next, at 10 o'clock A. M., Robert Rowe, Returning Officer. Peterboro', January 13th, 1859.

PHONOGRAPHY, or WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the Manual of Phonography, and the Phonographic Copy Book, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody who can learn anything, can learn Phonography from the Manual without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER" Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

Address, (post-paid)
